The dress should be agreeable to wear: and this includes something more than warmth and a good fit. It should be light, and should guard all dangers and inconveniences as possible.

These conditions being observed, it follows of course that the dress will be modest, and that it will be graceful. Grace and beauty are flowers which the tree of dress will bear, when the soil in it where things are put on for no purpose or use, as in the anti-rings, nose-rings, bustles, hoops, and all manner of cages in civilized wearers, the feathers on the head, and flaunting strips of gay color, whether of natural plumage or dyed, the flowers and furbelows that one sees—woe is Nolan, and woe be Lord Haven, and woe be French. Again the best taste is where the genuine uses of dress are not lost sight of, and the gratification of the eye of others is not allowed to interfere unduly or accurately and easily, and the colors are agreeable, and the forms are not unbecoming. The ornaments justified by some actual benefit, such as marking outlines, as the Greek borders did, or identifying the wearer, as Scotch plaids do, are to the limits and edges.

These seem to be the main conditions agreed upon as essential to a good mode of dress. It would appear to be a greater sin and absurdity in us than in our predecessors to be unmindful of them offensively, because the observance of these conditions is now so much easier than before. It is astonishing to us to discover, by thinking about it, how easily dress was to the gentry of the kingdom in the days of the Tudors, and how difficult it was even under the last of the Charleses and Jameses. The proportion of comfort and convenience which our dress must have been compared to that which when linen was only for the great. In the rural cottages and artisans' dwellings throughout the land, were matters of very much greater ease than ours, the history of which would not be agreeable to read. Comparatively speaking, it is in these days to think of clothes as meant to be changed every day and night, and often washed or otherwise purified.

The variety, the cheapness, the manageableness of the clothes of to-day, compared with former times, ought to render us obedient in an unequaled degree to the main conditions of good dress. Instead of this, we have days of extravagance ever carrying to the grave the victims of folly and ignorance in dress.

The first is it with regard to protection from heat, cold, damp, and glare?

A fashionable dress seems to be, on the whole, as little exceptionable as any that can be imagined one. We are not thinking of the women dressed in light woolen garments, stocks, and heavy head-gear in all climates and seasons alike. The mortality from this cause is comparatively so little as to separate them to be urged against the general character of dress. The fashionable lady may wear a costume which may be rendered warmer or cooler without losing its characteristics; which insulates the body, so that the skin, the seat of career's pleasure; leaves the limbs free, and need not be impeded. Moreover, the head-dress we must have denounced the cravat, or stock, as dangerous; but the throat, with its great blood-vessels, and its important nerves connected with the body with the brain, is now subject to so little pressure that we may hope that the evils of suffocation will go on till there is none at all. Twenty years ago, people said, you might know a philanthropist in America by his low cravat; and the evangelical lady was supposed to be known in England by a decolleté dress; but the unknown is here, with a mere black ribbon or light scrap of colored silk, long ago won their way far beyond the ranks of the philanthropist and the evangelical, and now the sense and courage to wear the natural throat—that is, to avoid unnecessary pressure—the head—improve their chances for a round throat, a clear head, and a long life. The hair is now, apparently, the only irrational part of the Englishman's dress; and so many strange devices are upon trial as a substitute for it, that we may safely leave it to the wearers to select some head-covering which shall defend the eyes and brain, be light and easy to carry, and admit air freely.

A new danger, however, has arisen with the invention of water-proof clothing. My readers may have found themselves tortured, or have seen some friend in agony, with an unaccountable teeth-ache or face-ache, coming on at the coming-house or office, day after day, and may have traced it to wearing galoches, which people wear now as if they were meant to serve instead of shoes, whereas they are fit only for passing from place to place in the wet weather. Take off the galoches or (which is nearly the same thing) the patent-leather shoes of the children in a school or a family, and you will find their stockings all damp. Keep on your water-proof cloak at a lecture, and you will find your thing you are wearing for your health's sake you go out into the air again. This wear of impervious clothing, otherwise than in walking in the rain, is the cause of much ailment in these early times of the use of gutta percha. Men who wear perfectly waterproof all times, except when in the rain, have really little to fear in the way of dress reform.

It is much otherwise with women. Their clothing does not protect them from cold, heat, damp, or glare. Some wear over the chest and arms under trying circumstances of heat and draught: but they are few; and they must have heard all the bad news that is in the way of warning. The great body of Englishwomen—those of the middle and lower middle classes usually—are afraid of covering from the throat to the hands and feet, but it is too seldom judicious in degree or quality. The modern fashions are excellent in principle as they go; but it is certain that the working-women are of our country are far more unprotected from the woolen clothing of their ancestors. At present, too, we woman who adopts the fashion of the time is as apt as not to be greatly guarded against the climate. Any modest man in good practice will tell of the cases of rheumatism since women ceased to wear their clothing about their limbs, and stuck it off with frauds and hoops, substituting a single petticoat. In this rational dressing, when they tried to make an umbrella serve the purpose of a house.

Then observe the head and the feet. The eyes are unsheltered from sun and wind, and the most important organs of the head is exposed. The bonnets which Englishwomen are so weak as to wear in imitation of the French. Again the hats have their painful tale to tell of neuralgic pains in the face and head, which abound beyond all prior experience of discomfort in the age, and all the consequences that might be anticipated from the practice of having the hair cut short at the nape of the neck, and leaving all the fore part of the shill exposed. Why the bonnet is worn at all is the puzzle. It is not worn for black, would be considered an absurdity as a substitute for the bonnet in a climate like ours; but it would be considered more serviceable than the hundred of flimsy decorations now usurping the place of the useful, cheap, and pretty ornament, which suits all ages and all in large variety. There are the hats, to be sure, which young men wear so unaccountably. They are hardly simple enough in form for a permanence, but they are substantially unexceptionable for health. Possibly some of the young sportsmen may tempt elderly ladies to put them on; but the value of imitation in matters of hats is not to be large one, and we may let them pass. In praising the hat, however, I am thinking of the sort that is a hem. The brim renders inconvenient and nearly as bad as the bonnet for use, while more fantastic. A little reflection will show that a feather plume may possibly suit a volunteer rifle corps or a regiment of Amazons rehearsing for the opera, but it is not even then suitable in rain.

The fearful spread of throat and chest diseases is manifest, by which we should know how necessary it is to the modern notion of muffling up the throat in furs and other heating substances. Before the days of steam, in the habits of any one of the evils of throat diseases which we now meet at every turn. Public speakers, days of coaching, days of commerce, and many tie up their throats with a silk handkerchief whenever they go abroad, in all seasons, sufficient to produce inflammation, bronchitis, sore throat, and other ailments never endured by those who cultivate more healthy habits and reserve such wraps for very special occasions. People who use cold water in some form of bath every day, and who go out of doors in all kinds of weather and threats to the bracing air, under the safeguard of vigorous personal exercise, forget what colds and coughs are.

As for the other point—the feet—it is to be feared that some are to go to the grave by the feet. Among the danger of gutta-percha and patent-leather shoes has been noticed. To the labors and exposure of the day would be admirable but for the military heels. Those heels throw the foot into an unnatural posture, by which great strain is produced. If my readers happen to be acquainted with a remarkable clairvoyant, they will have received many news of tunnions—that reverent of small maladies. They will learn that there has been an unheardof increase and severity of corns and bunions in high-heeled boots came in. The danger of falls is also considerable from the heels, which are apt to get a long tumble down the stairs when the foot part on their boots on the ground-floor.

If we consider the whole dress of 1859 under any of the remaining conditions, what can we say of it? Does the costume, as a whole, follow the outline of the form? Does it fit accurately and easily? Is the weight made to hang from the shoulders? Is the dress light, and in every way safe and agreeable in use? Is the mode modest and graceful? In all these points the modern fashions are conspicuously violated by those who think they dress well. Here and there we may meet a sensible woman, or a girl who has no money to spend in new clothes, whose appearance is pleasing—in a straw-bonnet that covers the head, in a neat gown which hangs gracefully and easily from the natural waist, and which does not sweep up the dirt: but the spectacle is now rare; for bad taste in the higher classes spreads very rapidly downward, corrupting the morals as it goes.

The modern dress perverts the form very disagreeably. The evil still begins with the stays, in too many instances, though there is less tightlacing than formerly. It is a pity that women do not know how little they gain by false pretenses in regard to figure and complexion. Our grandmothers would not have worn paint if they had been aware that it is useless after forty to attempt to seem younger—the texture of the skin revealing at a glance the fact which paint and dyed hair can not conceal—except perhaps in the parks or across a theatre. In the same way, the vessel waist produced by tight-lacing is always distinguishable in the ordinary dress, whether any evil have been done small waist. Compare the two extremes, and you will see it at once. Compare the figure of the Graces of Raffelle, or the Venus de Medici, with the smallest and most praised waist in a factory, and observe the difference. Perhaps, at most, the owner of the latter sees the smallness in front, and admires it accordingly; but all is disproportion. It is as still as the stem of a tree, and spoils the form and movement more than the armor of another knight ever did; and we know what a going on within. The ribs are pressed out of their place, down and inward, so that they are not only clapping one another: the heart is compressed, so that the circulation is irregular: the stomach and liver are pressed out of shape, and can not properly: and then parts which can not be squeezed are thrust out of their places, and great evils are the consequence. At the very best, the compression loses more than the figure can be supposed to gain. It is very painful to see what endured by some young women in shops and factories, as elsewhere, from the tight-lacing which is necessary to their work without gasping and being blue, or red, or white in the face. They can not go up stairs with dignity, and they can not take exactly free steps. Their arms are half-numb, and their hands red or chilblained; and they must walk as if they were afraid of a piece, to escape the horrid and grace of joints in the spine and limbs. A lady had the curiosity to lead what a dressmaker in a girl whom he saw like a wooden figure, and found a complete pallaise excoriating round the body of the girl. Considering the girl pleased that she had "only six-and-twenty shakeboues!"

Any visitor of a range of factories will be sure to find that girls are dropping in fainting-fits, here and there, however pure the air and proper the temperature; and he may be sure that they are seen a sexed and disgusted proprietor, seeking the warehouse-women, or by some matron, to the spot. A pair of large scissors, with directions to cut open the stays of some silly woman who had fainted, the occasional inquiries afford a direct warning of the fatal effects which may follow the practice of tightlacing; but such instances are now much more common; and the register exhibits, not the stays, but the malady created by the stays as the cause of death. There is much room and scope for physician who practices among the working classes still testify.

Do the petticoats of our time serve as any thing but a mask to the human form—a perversion of human proportion? A woman with her skirts like a child popping up from a haycock. A girl in the dance looks as if she had a bolster-case tied on a favorite toy in my infancy. The fit is so the reverse of accurate as to be like a silly hoax—a masquerade without wit: with the same time, it is not an easy fit. The prodigious weight of the modern petticoat, and the difficulty of putting it all into the waistband, creates a necessity for compressing and loading the waist in a way most incurious as health. Under the present method of dress the waist should suffer neither weight nor pressure—neither—but the skirts should be which brings the garment into form and folds. As to the convenience of the hooped skirts, only ask the women themselves why, when it is always in danger from fire, or wind, or water, or carriage-wheels, or rails, or pails, or mud, or, in short, every thing they encounter. Ask the husbands, fathers, or brothers, and hear how they like being cut with the steel spars when they enter a gate or a door, or being driven into a corner of the pew at church, or to the outside of the coach, or the middle of the fire for the children—how many have been swept off pathways, or foot-bridges, or steamboat decks by the pliliest occasions, or how many have been drowned while bathing! More children have been killed, however, by the extension of the petticoat beyond fashion to them. For many months past it has been a rare thing to see a child under the tunic age duly attended. The governesses are away in Europe; and the actual clothing, from the waist downward, is nothing more than a bag of flannel and calico, leaving a bare space between. For older boys there is a great improvement in dress—the tunic and knee-trowser having probably been the very be the stiff manish tailed coat and tight trowsers of a few years ago. But the younger children are at present scarcely clothed at all below the arms; and the blue legs of childhood are a painful sight, whether in a factory or boy at work in play. Even in such a climate as Sierra Leone there is something fearful in allowing a child to be naked in a great house wearing (and possessing) nothing more in the way of clothing than a muslin gown and a blue bead-necklace (on an adult's allowance—two) but in winter like ours to see children's legs covered with nothing better than their clothes (skin, because the ornamentation is the vanity), is in fact reading the sentence of death of many victims. Let it be remembered, that the most susceptible, rheumatic, and heart diseases has brought on by one of limitation of dress. The wasted cheeks and livid eyelids bonnets, in exposing the throat to the influence of the east wind, are the consequence of the dress of the day. Let it be remembered that the most susceptible, rheumatic, and heart diseases has brought on by one of limitation of dress. The wasted cheeks and livid eyelids bonnets, in exposing the throat to the influence of the east wind, are the consequence of the dress of the day.

What is to be done? Will any thing ever be done? or is feminine willfulness and slavishness to fashion to kill off hundreds and thousands of the race, as at present? There are whole societies in America who do not see the necessity for such mischief, and who hope to put an end to it—in their own country at least. The Dress-Reform Association of the United States was instituted some years since by women who refused the inconvenience of Paris fashions in American housetends: and they have been aided, not only by physicians, but by other men, on the ground of the right of women to wear what suits their occupations and their taste, without molestation. The dress which was long ago agreed upon, after careful consideration—the so-called Bloomer costume (not as we see it in caricature, but in its near resemblance to the most rational English fashion of recent times)—is extensively worn, not only in rural districts but in many towns. It seems to fulfill the various conditions of rational, modest, and graceful dress better than any other as yet devised for temperate climates; and if so, it will spread, in spite of all opposition.

What opposition it met with here is not forgotten, at home or abroad, and never will be forgotten. Some of our highest philosophers and best-bred gentlemen were more indignant and ashamed than perhaps any lady else. They said that we constantly saw Englishmen angry and scornful because of the indignities cast by Mohammedan bigotry on the dress of Europeans in Damascus and Jerusalem; but here were Englishmen doing the same thing, without equal excuse, when full-blown women proposed to adapt their dress to their health, convenience, and notions of grace. The aggression triumphed. They induced outcast women to adopt the dress, and stamped it with disrepute before it had a chance of a trial. It was an unmanly act; and if those who were concerned in it have since suffered from extravagance of wife and daughters, or from sickness and death in their households which might have been averted by a sensible method of clothing old and young, they have had their retribution. Some of our newspapers are rebuking others for meddling with the women's choice of fashions—quoting the rebuke sustained by the old Spectator on account of that line of criticism: but it is an affair which concerns both sexes and all ages. What hinders a simple obedience to common sense in the matter? It is only for the women of those classes who really have business in life to refuse to encumber themselves with tight, or heavy, or long, or unserviceable dress; and to adhere to any mode which suits them; and then, whatever the idle and fanciful may choose to do, the useless mortality will be mainly stopped, and the general health prevented from sinking lower. It may be confidently avowed that in this way only can women win back some of the respect which they have forfeited by the original sin and folly of their dress within the last few seasons. From the duchess to the maid-servant, the slaves of French taste have lost position; and it will require a permanent establishment of some leading points of the sense and morality of dress to restore their full dignity to the maitresse and maidenhood of England.

A TALE OF TWO CITIES.

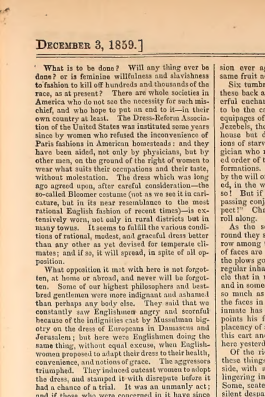
By CHARLES DICKENS.

BOOK III.

THE TRACK OF A STORM.

CHAPTER XV.

THE FOOTSTEPS DIE OUT FOREVER.



ALONG the Paris streets the dead-carts rumble, hollow and harsh. Six tumbrils carry the day's wine to La Guillotine. All the devouring and insatiable Monsters imaginable since imagination could record itself are fused in the one realization, Guillotine. And yet there is not in France, with its rich variety of soil and climate, a blade, a leaf, a root, a sprig, a pepper-corn, which will grow to maturity under conditions more certain than those that have produced this horror. Crush humanity out of shape once more, under similar hammers, and it will twist itself into the same tortured forms. Sow the same seed of rapacious license and oppression ever again, and it will surely yield the same fruit according to its kind.

Six tumbrils roll along the streets. Change them back again to what they were, thou powerful enchanter, Time, and they shall be seen to be the carriages of absolute monarchs, the equipages of feasting nobles, the 1 iets of flaring Jezebels, the churches that are not any father's house but dens of thieves, the haunts and instions of starving peasants! No; the great magician who majestically works out the sentenced order of the Creator never reverses his transformations. "If thou be changed into this shape by the will of God," says the seer to the enchanted, in the wise Arabian stories, "then remain set. But if thou wear this form through mere passing conjuration, then resume thy former aspect!" Changeless and hopeless, the tumbrils roll along.

As the sombre wheels of the six carts go round they seem to plow up a long cultivated furrow among the populaces in the streets. Ridges of faces are thrown to this side and to that, and the plow goes steadily onward. So much are the regular inhabitants of the houses to the spectacle that in many windows there are no people, and in some the occupations of the hands is not so much as suspended, while the eyes seem to be faces in the tumbrils. Here and there the inmate has visitors to see the sight; then he points his finger, with something of the complacency of a conjurer or authorized exponent, to this cart and to that, and seems to tell who sit here yesterday, and who there the day before.

Of the riders in the tumbrils some observe these things, and all things on their way, bestride with an impassive voice; others, with a lingering interest in the ways of life and men. Some, seated with drooping heads, are sunk in silent despair; again there are some so bestial of their looks that they cast upon the multitude such glances as they have seen in theatres and in pictures. Several close their eyes and think, or try to get their straying thoughts together. Only one, and he a miserable creature of a crimson abroad of the horror, all scarlet from girdle to collar, cries for mercy and tries to dance. Not one of the wretches utters threats, by look or gesture, to the pity of the people.

There is a guard of sundry horsemen riding abreast of the tumbrils, and faces are often turned up to some of them, and they are asked some questions, which would seem to be always the same question, for it is always followed by a press of people toward the third cart. The foremost demand of all these questioners is put out one man in it with their swords. The leading curiosity is to see him apply a hand, or be stayed by the back of the tumbril with his head bent down to converse with a mere girl who sits on the side of the cart and holds his hand. His has no curiosity or care for the scene about him, and always speaks to the girl. She is a fair young creature in the last street of St. Honore cries are raised against him. If they move him at all, it is only in a quiet degree. He shakes his hair a little more loosely about his face. He can not easily touch his face, his arms are bound.

On the steps of a church, awaiting the coming up of the tumbrils, stands the Spy and pricture-dong. He looks into the faces of those: not there. He looks into the second: not there. He already said himself, "I look for a sacrificed man!" when his face clears as he looks into the third.

"Which is Evrémonde?" says a man behind him.

"That. At the back there."

"With his hand in the girl's?"

"Yes."

The man cries "Down, Evrémonde! To the Guillotine all aristocrats! Down, Evrémonde!"

"Hush, hush!" the Spy entreats him, timidly. "And why not, citizen?"

"He is going to pay the forfeit: it will be paid in five minutes more. Let him be at peace."

But the man continuing to exclaim, "Down, Evrémonde!" the face of Evrémonde is for a moment turned toward him. Evrémonde then sees the Spy, and looks attentively at him, and goes his way.

The clocks are on the stroke of three, and the furrow plowed among the populace is turning round, to come on into the place of execution, and end. Faces thrown to this side and to that are to that now crumble in and close behind the last plow as it passes on, for all are following to the Guillotine. In front of it, seated in chairs as in a garden of public diversion, are a number of women, busily knitting. On one of the foremost chairs stands The Vengeance, looking toward the coming face.

"Thérèse!" she cries, in her shrill tones. "Who has seen her? Thérèse Defarge!"

She has missed before," says a knitting woman of the sisterhood.

"No; not while she's mine now," cries The Vengeance, petulantly. "Thérèse!"

"Louder," the woman recommends.

Ay! Louder, Vengeance, much louder, and still she will scarcely hear thes. Louder yet, Vengeance, with a little oath or so added to it, yet it will hardly bring her. Send other women up and down to sock her, lingering somewhere and yet, although the messengers have done dread deeds, it is questionable whether of their own wills they will go far enough to find her!

"Bad Fortune!" cries The Vengeance, stamping her foot in the chair; "and here are the tumbrils! And Evrémonde will be dispatched in a wink, and she not here! See her knitting in my hand, and her empty chair ready for her. I cry with vexation and disappointment!"

As The Vengeance descends from her elevation to do it the tumbrils begin to discharge their loads. The ministers of Sainte Guillotine are robed and ready. Crash!—A head is held up, and the knitting women, who scarcely lift their eyes to look at the tall figure now upon it which could think and speak, count One.

"THE TWO STAND IN THE FAST-THINNING THRONG OF VICTIMS," ETC.

The second tumbril empties and moves on, and the knitting women, Crash!—And the knitting women, never faltering or pausing in their work, count Two.

The supposed Evrémonde descends, and the seamstress is lifted out next after him. He has not relinquished her patient hand in getting out, but still holds it as he promised. He gets his places here with her back to the crushing engine, that constantly whirrs up and falls, and she looks into his face and thanks him.

"But for you, dear stranger, I should not be so composed, for I am naturally a poor little thing, faint of heart; nor should I have been able to raise my thoughts to Him who was put to death, that we might have hope and comfort here to-day. I thank you with a full heart for it, dear stranger, and I bless you!"

"I say not no, nay Sydney Carton. "Keep your eyes upon me, dear child, and mind no other object."

"I mind nothing while I hold your hand. I shall mind nothing when I let it go, if they are quick."

"They will be rapid. Fear not!"

The two stand in the fast-thinning throng of victims, but they speak as if they were alone. Eye to eye, voice to voice, hand to hand, heart to heart, these two children of the Universal Mother, else so wide apart and differing, have come together on the dark highway, to repair home together and to rest in her bosom.

"Brave and generous friend, will you let me ask you one last question? I am very ignorant, and it troubles me—just a little."

"Tell me what it is."

"I am a poor creature, an only relative, and an orphan, like myself, whom I love very dearly. She is five years younger than I, and she lives in a farmer's house in the south country. Pray orply parted us, and she knows nothing of my fate—for I can not write—and if I could, how should I tell her! It is better as it is."

"Yes, yes: better as it is."

"What I have been thinking as we came along, and what I am still thinking now, as I look into your kind strong face, which gives me so much support, is this: If the Republic really do good to the poor, and they come to be less hungry, and in all ways to suffer less, she may live a long time; she may even live to be old."

"What then, my gentle sister?"

"Do you think"—the uncomplaining eyes in which there is so much endurance fill with tears, and the lips part a little more and tremble—"that it will seem long to me while I wait for her in the better land, where I trust both you and I will be mercifully sheltered?"

"It can not be, my child; there is no Time there, and no trouble there."

"You comfort me so much! I am so ignorant! Am I to kiss you now? Is the moment arrived?"

"Yes."

She kisses his lips; he kisses hers; they solemnly bless each other. The spare hand does not tremble as he releases it; nothing worse than a vivid, bright constancy is in the patient face. She goes next before him—is gone; the knitting women count Twenty-Two.

"I am the Resurrection and the Life, saith the Lord: he that believeth in me, though he were dead, yet shall he live: and whosoever liveth and believeth in me, shall never die."

The murmuring of many voices, the murmuring of many faces, the pressing on of many footsteps in the outskirts of the crowd, so that it swells forward in a mass, like one great breave of water, all flashes away. Twenty-Three.

They said of him, about the city that night, that it was the peace he had made on his face ever he held there. Many added that he looked sublime and prophetic.

One of the most remarkable sufferers by the same axe—a woman—had asked at the foot of the steps to be allowed, not long before, to be allowed to write down the thoughts that were inspiring her. If he had given any utterance to his, and they were prophetic, they would have been these:

"I see Barsad, and Cly, Defurge, The Vengeance, the Jaryman, the Judge, long ranks of the new oppressors who have risen on the destruction of the old, perishing by this retributive instrument, before it shall cease out of its present use. I see a beautiful city and a brilliant people rising from this abyss, and, in their struggles to be truly free, in their triumphs and defeats, through long long years to come, I see the evil of this time, and of the previous time of which this is the natural birth, gradually making expiation for itself and wearing out.

"I see the lives for which I lay down my life, peaceful, useful, prosperous, and happy, in that England which I shall see no more. I see Her with a child upon her bosom, who bears my name. I see her father, aged and bent, but otherwise restored, and faithful to all men in his healing office, and at peace. I see the good old man, so long their friend, in ten years' time enriching them with all he has, and passing tranquilly to his reward.

"I see that I hold a sanctuary in their hearts, and in the hearts of their descendants, generations hence. I see her, an old woman, weeping for me on the anniversary of this day. I see her and her husband, their course done, lying side by side in their place of rest, and I know that each was not more honored and held sacred in the other's soul than I was in the souls of both.

"I see that child who lay upon her bosom and bore my name, a man, winning his way up to that path of life which once was mine. I see him winning it so well that my name is made illustrious there by the light of his. I see the blots I threw upon it faded away. I see him, foremost of just judges and honored men, bringing a boy of my name, with a forehead that I know and golden hair, to this place—then full of light—and, with not a trace of this day's disfigurement—and I hear him tell the child my story with a tender and a faltering voice.

"It is a far, far better thing that I do than I have ever done; it is a far, far better rest that I go to than I have ever known."

THE END.

CHARLIE'S WOOING.

"CHARLIE, darling! Charlie, prude!
For a welcomeness have I wooed
Half your love on me to shower
Only through one little hour.
Now, near wrecked my heart's Armada
(Freighted with such wealth of ardor)
On the cruel rocks of your pride!
(Now a blush suffused her cheek)—
"Charlie, prude, I pray you, speak!"

"Charlie modest! Charlie saucy!
Even prudie may be mossy
With a verdure not its own.
I vow you think my heart is stone!
Love you through the hour you've sued?
Would a lifetime sound too rude?
(Now a kiss for interlude)—
"Let my lifetime thank you, prude!"

ADVERTISEMENTS.

Affections of the Throat.

From the Rev. S. J. P. Anderson, Pastor of the Central Church, St. Louis.—"I have been in the habit of using Brown's Bronchial Troches, or Lozenges, when compelled to speak through suffering from cold. They are very beneficial in clearing the throat, having no injurious tendencies if any kind. I can confidently recommend them to public speakers generally."

"I heartily unite in the above recommendation."—Rev. M. Schauler, Rector of Christ Church, St. Louis.

JONAS WHITCOMB'S
REMEDY FOR
ASTHMA

Is worthy the attention of all who suffer from the distressing complaint. This new HOME REMEDY, MADE IN Boston, visited Europe a few years since for the benefit of his health, which was much impaired by frequent attacks of Spasmodic Asthma.

While in Germany, an eminent physician became interested in his case, and promised him relief. He followed the treatment ordered, and, to his surprise and joy, his asthma almost entirely disappeared. He procured the recipe which had accomplished so much for him, brought it with him to this country, and it became the property of the present proprietors. It contains no poisonous or injurious properties whatever; and as its effect may take it with perfect safety.

———

(Letter from a distinguished lawyer in Newburyport, Mass.)

Asthma.
Asthma.
Asthma.

NEWBURYPORT, Feb. 23, 1859.

MESSRS. JOSEPH BURNETT & CO.—Gentlemen—I received twelve minutes since I received the first bottle of your valuable medicine for the cure of Asthma.

I am now satisfied that my relief from one of the most engrossing, most distressing, and most unpleasant diseases, renders that over afflicted a bosom debt, to be to attributed wholly to that Remedy. For thirteen years I suffered with the Asthma, and it grew upon me in severity, until, in the last year, I was, for the most part of the season, confined to the house; and for the last winter ever expected being on a paroxysm, oftentimes to recover that I could not move an inch for relief.

From the time I took the first dose of your "Remedy," to the present hour, I have not had a single attack, and now my system is so free from it that the most active exercise and exposure seems to have any effect upon me. I am slightly restrict the lungs. Your medicine soon dispels that sensation, and I can safely claim a perfect release from the tormentor.

With great respect, your obedient servant,

J. H. BRADBON.

(Extract from a letter written by a distinguished Lawyer in Maine.)

Asthma.
Asthma.
Asthma.

MESSRS. JOSEPH BURNETT & Co.—Gentlemen—I tried more than thirty different species for the Asthma, until I had become worn down by disease, and almost discouraged. When I commenced taking your medicine I had been afflicted with the disease about seventeen years. I am of the spasmodic kind; and in a bad attack I have frequently sat up almost nights in succession. After using and taking your medicine I found an unaccustomed relief. My health and strength began to improve. I have gained about twenty pounds in weight, and have, comparatively, no Asthma. When I feel the symptoms returning, a few teaspoonfuls of the medicine is sufficient to relieve me.

It seems to me that the very introduction of your medicine has been broken up, and that it will soon entirely leave me. At any rate, no one that has suffered as I have, can, therefore, and enjoyed the health that I have enjoyed since last fall, can hesitate to believe that yours is a wonderful power in JONAS WHITCOMB'S Remedy for the Asthma.

Respectfully yours, H. B. VOSE.

(Letter from a Clergyman.)

Asthma.
Asthma.
Asthma.

WARDSBORO', Vt., May 31, 1857.

MESSRS. JOSEPH BURNETT & CO.—Gentlemen—I take pleasure in stating the wonderful effects of WHITCOMB'S REMEDY FOR THE ASTHMA" on myself. As I often as ten or twelve times in a year she was brought to the very gates of death, requiring two or three watchers, sometimes for several days and nights in succession. At one time she was so far gone that her physician and myself could but pulse. I consulted numerous physicians of the highest celebrity, both in regular and in surgery, and I heard of "WHITCOMB'S Remedy," it acted like a charm; it enabled her to sleep quietly in a few minutes, and nearly relieved her of the disease. I am a Methodist Clergyman, stationed here. I shall be happy to answer any inquiries addressed to me.

Yours truly, KIMBALL HADLEY.

Asthma.
Asthma.
Asthma.

SOUTH WINDSOR, MASS., Jan. 23, 1859.

MESSRS. JOSEPH BURNETT & CO.—I see your notice of JONAS WHITCOMB'S ASTHMA REMEDY in the Boston Pilot, and I wish to tell you of the effect it has had upon me. I was troubled very much for about five years, many nights I could not sleep at all. I got a sooner any medicine, but to-day I got some medicine for less.

I began taking your medicine last Saturday night. I have not had a bad attack—have not been able to sleep, nor an hour's sweat, since. I am a shoemaker by trade, and live in South Windsor.

Your obedient servant, MICHAEL KEARNY.

Prepared by JOSEPH BURNETT & CO., Boston, and sold by all Druggists.

One Dollar per Bottle.

Ladies' Furs at Genin's Bazaar,
513 Broadway.
Under the St. Nicholas Hotel.

HUDSON BAY SABLE,
MINK, MARTEN,
SQUIRREL,
ROYAL ERMINE,
OF THE LATEST STYLES FROM EUROPE,
CHILDREN'S FURS,
IN ELEGANT VARIETY,
STOCK LARGE,
ASSORTMENT COMPLETE,
PRICES MODERATE.
GENIN'S BAZAAR,
513 Broadway.

ITCHING CHILBLAINS.

A sure relief, "Dupuy's Chilblain Balm." 25 cents per box; per mail, 30 cents. Sold at 602 Broadway.

For Mayor
HON. GEORGE OPDYKE.

Headquarters at Dwyer's Hotel, corner of Eighth Street and Broadway. Citizens of all parties, favorable to an honest and efficient city administration, and to the election of officers under no obligations to corrupt organizations, are invited to meet daily at this place.

THE LEADING TWO DOLLAR MAGAZINE.

Arthur's Home Magazine,
FOR 1860.

VOLUMES XV. AND XVI.

EDITED BY
T. S. ARTHUR AND VIRGINIA F. TOWNSEND.
DEVOTED TO SOCIAL LITERATURE, ART, MORALS, HOME, FASHION, AND DOMESTIC HAPPINESS.

The Publishers, in offering their programme for 1860, have the pleasure to announce the completion of a series of arrangements, by which The Home Magazine will be rendered valuable and attractive far beyond precedent, and placed still further than heretofore out of the reach of competition by any periodical of the same price.

ELEGANT STEEL PLATES,

Engraved expressly for this work, from carefully selected subjects, will be given regularly. These will form a gallery of NEW AND BEAUTIFUL HOME PICTURES, each worth the price of the number containing it.

The Literature of The Home Magazine is chiefly incorned by the publishers to be to rise by a large addition to reading and embellishment.

In this department no number will be commenced a new Story, by T. S. ARTHUR, entitled

"AFTER THE STORM."

Miss Townsend will continue to furnish, regularly, those charming stories and exquisite picture-sketches, with full-length portraits of character, for which readers will be

Writers of the First Talent and Reputation will give their best efforts to the pages of The Home Magazine, in order to make it the highest excellence. Besides its carefully edited and original articles by a corps of special literary contributors, The Magazine is devoted to reports of special interest to the fair sex. It has

A HEALTH DEPARTMENT,
A MOTHER'S DEPARTMENT,
A TOILET and NEEDLE-WORK DEPARTMENT,
A BOY'S AND GIRL'S TREASURY,
A HOUSEKEEPER'S DEPARTMENT,
A REVIEW DEPARTMENT.

Plan, Etc., Etc.

In order to meet the wants and wishes of a very large number of ladies, particular attention is paid to Toilet and Needle-work Articles.

Beautiful Colored Steel

FASHION PLATES

appear in every number of The Home Magazine.

From Six to Eight Pages of Needle-work Patterns, Drawings of Children's Dresses, Infants' Robes, Bonnets, Caps, Collars, Slippers, Head-dresses, Under-sleeves, Etc., Etc., Etc.

Thus furnishing

Styles of Dress and Pattern for Embroidery in an almost endless variety, to be found in no other than a hundred pages during the year, and including more than a thousand separate articles.

From the beginning, the aim of the Publishers has been to furnish, at the cheapest price, a Magazine that, by means of a choice literature, should do a good work in home and social circles everywhere, and their success, so far, is of the most gratifying character. It is now, as well in the extent and variety as in that of approval and cheer that come to them from all directions, as in the steadily increasing circulation of the Magazine, manifest in past years.

Any person to Clubs is made so low that there is scarcely a family in the land but may subscribe for the regular visits of the Home Magazine.

☞ Those who send names in a Club, or procure The Home Magazine for a year at the trifling cost of $1 25 each.

TERMS:

TWO DOLLARS A YEAR, IN ADVANCE.

TWO COPIES FOR ONE YEAR $3; FOUR COPIES FOR ONE YEAR $6.

All additional subscribers above four at the same rate, that is, $1 25 per annum. Where twelve subscribers and upwards are sent, the getter-up of the Club will be entitled to an additional copy of the Magazine.

☞ Those who send names of Clubs will be entitled to the extra copy by making additions thereto until the number reaches twelve.

☞ It is not required that all the subscribers to a Club be at the same post-office.

☞ Specimen numbers sent to all who wish to subscribe or make up Clubs.

CLUBBING.

Home Magazine and Godey's Lady's Book, one year, $3 50.

Home Magazine and Harper's Magazine, one year, $3 50.

Home Magazine and Saturday Evening Post, $3.

☞ The January number will be ready as a specimen by 1st of December.

Address T. S. ARTHUR & CO.,
323 Walnut Street, Philadelphia.

Watches and Jewelry,
At No. 11 Wall Street, Up Stairs.
Special and Important Notice.

At the present price for a few days.

Gold Watches, 18 karats, only $18, worth $22.
Sterling Silver Watches, only $6 worth $16.
Every article from 20 per cent less.
Also a splendid assortment of Jewelry.
Only for a few days to make room for other Goods.
J. MACDUFF, No. 11 Wall Street, up stairs.

CLARK'S SCHOOL VISITOR.—A Day School Paper for North, South, East, and West, finely illustrated, contains Readings, Dialogues, Music, School News, Puns, &c., &c. Edited by ALEX. CLARK and UNCLE EDWARD. Pictorial Heading School Visitor, gratis. Terms: 20 cents a year; Three copies $1; Twelve, $3. To Teachers, 75 cents. Address ALEX. CLARK, Editor and Publisher, Pittsburgh, Pa.

CROUP.—A Cheap and Warranted Preventive without Medicine. Address Dr. E. B. FOOTE, 346 Broadway, N. Y.

New Polkas.

PET ROBIN POLKA (illustrated) ..50 cents.
PEEK-A-BOO ..50 cents.
BOB BOB WHITE POLKA ..25 cents.

These polkas are well marked for dancing, and come easily under the fingers. Any of them will be sent to any address on receipt of the price.

Published by FITCH, POND & CO.,
Sol Broadway, New York.

A Lie Refuted.

"Who dyed your hair?" "It isn't dyed,"
The indignant gentleman replied.
"Twas dead before, but sure it's alive,
It ain't a fortunate which it thrives."

"Who said 'twas dyed?—he lied!
With him it was the truth that died.
The Wash Invigorates and brings dead hair to life,
And he who doubts my word can ask my wife."

This "Intimidate" commends itself to every fair lady to its original color, stop its falling out, and bring it out on bald heads. Sold everywhere.

W. E. HAGAN & CO., Proprietors, Troy, N. Y.

Hosiery
and Men's Furnishing Goods.

A great assortment of best goods at prices generally paid for inferior qualities.

Also, Gentlemen's Capes. One price, and money cheerfully refunded in case of dissatisfaction.

A. RANKIN & CO.,
No. 637 Broadway
and No. 96 Bowery.

Established in 1823.

DR. J. B. MARCHISI'S
Celebrated Uterine Catholicon,

For the Relief and Cure of Suffering Females.

This valuable and universal habitude of female life acquisitions a variety of diseases which this Catholicon will sometimes cure. It can be relied upon in any case of Painful, Suppressed, or Irregular Menstruation, Prolapsus Uteri, Chronic Inflammation, Ulceration, Weakness, Faintness, Lassitude, &c. When every thing else has failed, this article is never taken without benefit. No suffering female should leave it untried. A pamphlet, with full directions for treatment, which can be applied by mail, or delivered by any Agent. It is send in every case. Agents wanted in every town. Address, for pamphlet, &c., by mail, or any certificates altered,

Address BARNES & PARK, No. 13 Park Row, N. Y. Dr. PARK, Consulting at Office. WEEKS & POTTER, Boston; or CALLENDER & CO., Philad.

J. B. MARCHISI, M.D., Utica, N. Y.

NEW GIFT BOOK HOUSE.

The Subscribers have commenced the sale of Books on the Gift Principle, and hope that by offering extra inducements to receive a share of patronage. We offer the richest collection of Books to be found in any establishment. Also liberal inducements to Agents. Catalogues sent to any address.

WM. A. WILLIAMS & CO. (Late Buck),
No. 37 Park Row and 145 Nassau Street,
New York.

The Book for the Times.

Its Praise.

The Life of
CAPTAIN JOHN BROWN,
The Liberator of Kansas
and
Hero of Harper's Ferry.
By James Redpath.

One elegant 12mo volume of 400 pages, illustrated, and containing a fine of the glorious old man. Price $1 00.

STEEL PORTRAIT

This work will be issued before the First of January, 1860, and will be a work of thrilling and fascinating interest. Its sale will be immense. A liberal percentage of the resulting from its publication

PROFITS

WILL BE GIVEN TO THE FAMILY OF BROWN.

THOUSANDS OF AGENTS

Will be wanted to supply the demand in every town, village, and hamlet throughout the country. Address

THAYER & ELDRIDGE, Publishers,
Nos. 114 and 116 Washington Street,
Boston, Mass.

ELOQUENT DISCOURSES,

SHELDON & CO.,
No. 115 Nassau Street, N. Y.,
PUBLISH THIS DAY,
Sermons.
BY RICHARD FULLER, D.D.,
Of Baltimore.
One volume 12mo. Price One Dollar.

A New Edition of
BLANCO WHITE'S DISCUSSIONS;
Or,
THE SUPERSTITION SCHOOL
BY WILLIAM J. HOGE, D.D.
On Tinted Paper. 16mo. Price 75 cents.

Sent by mail on receipt of the prices annexed.

Harper's
Holiday Pictorial
Now Ready.

The most beautiful Pictorial Sheet ever issued.

PRICE SIX CENTS.

Sent by mail anywhere in the United States on receipt of the price.

HARPER & BROTHERS, Franklin Square, N. Y.

A Beautiful Complexion.—Laird's Bloom of Youth or Liquid Pearl is the best article in existence for beautifying and preserving the complexion and skin. Its wonderful effects may be seen and tried gratis, at LAIRD'S ladies' hair-dressing establishment, 6?? Broadway.

NOVEMBER.

The winds are cold.—See the skies are drear;
A shriller blast each night we hear,
A colder rain-storm bringing;
On summer's blue store withered flowers,
While robins in their leafless bowers
Her requiem are singing!

Gone are the glowing hels of June;
July's bright blossom's vanished soon,
And August's perfumed meadows;
September and October brought
Their fruits and flowers, nor thought,
And all these fled like shadows!

So time slips on, and each month and year
Bearing its part to the sere,
And to the cypress shadows;
Soon petals of hope and flowers
While cadly under leaden hours
Our hopes blow to seasons.

But of the calm, substantial joys
Which neither time nor care destroys,
A few, thank Heaven, are left us.
Neither the months, which have an end,
Nor all the years that yet have fled,
Of Saints' Rest can have bereft us!

And still, in FULTON STREET, their stores
Firing upon what their eyes adores,
Inviting all to enter,
And still the Farms, with flag unfurled,
Challenge all RIVALS IN THE WORLD,
With them their fate to venture!

Their FALL AND WINTER CLOTHES compared,
With those in other stores prepared,
May challenge competition!
To be the "Clothiers of the Nation,"
And MEN and BOYS, at cheapest rates,
To dress—they feel "really and truly"
Is their ambition!

"Twin Temples of Fashion."

ONE PRICE—NO DEVIATION.
The Price is marked on all the Goods in Plain Figures.

SMITH BROTHERS,
The Marble Stores,
122, 138, and 140
Fulton Street,
Between Broadway and William St.,
ROBERT L. SMITH, Jr.,
J. SMITH ELDER. } NEW YORK.

THE NEW BOOKS

MICHELET'S LOVE (L'Amour). $1 00.
VERNEUIL GENIUS. College Story. $1.
LIFE OF ALEXANDER VON HUMBOLDT. $1 50.
Any of the above sent by mail, postage prepaid, on receipt of price, $1 00.
* Send by mail, postage prepaid, for any Book published in Great Britain or America. Address, New York, BUNCE & CHAMBERLAIN.

FURS AT GENIN'S BAZAAR,
507 and 513 Broadway.

300 MINK CAPES AT $20, WORTH $30.
MINK MUFFS AT $10, WORTH $15.
MINK FISHER CAPES, FROM $65 AND UP.
WEASEL
HUDSON BAY SABLE CAPES, FROM $85 AND UPWARD.
GENIN'S BAZAAR
507 and 513 Broadway.

THE ORIGINAL BRIDGEWATER
PAINT OF NEW JERSEY, Established 1826,

For Roofs, Wood, Iron, Tin, Bricks, Canvas, Cement, Paper, &c., dries readily, forming a metallic coat, spark and ember proof. Double Refined Linseed Oil. Agent 72 Maiden Lane, New York.

BROOKS & BETTS, Agents.

MUSICAL BOXES,

Playing 2, 3, 4, 6, 8, 10, 12, 16, 24, and 36 tunes.
PAILLARD & MARTIN, Importers,
Musical Manufacturers, 21 Maiden Lane, N. Y.

FINKLE & LYON'S SEWING MACHINES
—Warranted to give better satisfaction than any other machine in the market. Price reduced.
N.B.—FREE RECORD TO $50.

No. 352 Broadway.

Partial Deafness, Discharges from the Ear,

NOISES IN THE HEAD, CATARRH,

And all diseases of the Throat, EYE and EAR permanently cured by DR. LIGHTHILL, No. 21 Howd Street, N. Y.

Artificial eyes gratis.

Forty Dollars per Month.

500 Agents wanted to travel and solicit orders for the celebrated Patent Fluted Dollar Sewing Machine. Salary $40 per month, or a large commission. For sample machine, and full particulars, address, with stamp enclosed for return postage,

I. M. DAGGETT & CO.,
Boston, Mass.

IF WHISKERS AND MUSTACHES are required in six weeks, use my original preparation 1850, which will force them to grow six weeks from the first application, and without stain or injury to the skin. Price $1. Sent by mail, post free, to any address. E. C. PRITCHARD, 63 Nassau Street, New York.

HUNGARIAN WINES.—A parcel of superfine RED and WHITE HUNGARIAN WINES, in wood and in flasks, for sale by

CHARLES F. LOOSEY,
No. 2 Hanover Square, Room No. 6

FAMILY KNITTING MACHINES FOR Family and Plantation use. Agency, 614 Broadway, up stairs, opposite St. Nicholas Hotel.

POWERFUL MICROSCOPES or Magnifying Glasses, for 50 cents. Magnifying more than two hundred times. Sent by mail everywhere. Four of different powers for $1. "Perfect little wonders."—Sailor's Pictorial.

C. B. UNDERWOOD, 111 Hanover Street, Boston.

The Ladies all bear Testimony to its WORTH.—HIRAM HAVEN'S HAIR APPARENT.—HIRAM HAVEN restores hair, dry, and wiry hair, and gives to it a soft, glossy, wavy appearance, exceedingly beautiful. It strengthens the roots, prevents the falling off, and causes it to turn from gray to black. It when gray to all the rich luxuriance and life color of youth. Sold by all Druggists and by HIRAM HAVEN & Co., No. 194 CHESTNUT STREET, Philadelphia.

To Housekeepers.

SOMETHING NEW.—B. T. BABBITT'S BEST MEDICINAL SALERATUS, Is manufactured from cocoanut-nut, and is prepared entirely different from other Saleratus. All the deleterious matter extracted in such a manner as to prevent the Bread, Biscuit, and all kinds of Cake, without containing a particle of Saleratus when the Bread or Cake is baked; therefore, by producing wholesome, healthful food. The particle of Saleratus is turned to gas, and passes through the bread or Biscuit while Baking; consequently nothing remains, but wholesome food, as nature made it. You will readily perceive that the principle of this Saleratus that it is entirely different from other Saleratus.

It is packed in one pound papers, each wrapper branded, "B. T. BABBITT'S Best Medicinal Saleratus;" also, picture, testimonial leaf of bread, with a gist of directions using water on the top. When you purchase one paper you should preserve the wrapper, and be particular to get the next exactly like the first—and as above.

Full directions for making Bread, Biscuit, Cake, &c., with each paper. B. T. BABBITT, will accompany each package of this, also directions for making all kinds of Flower; also, for making Soda Water and Sedlitz Powders.

MAKE YOUR OWN SODA WITH B. T. BABBITT'S PURE CONCENTRATED POTASH. Warranted double the strength of cotton, or Pearl Ash, and is entirely free from Sulphur, and is the best Family Potash in market. Consumers will find this the cheapest Potash in market.

Manufactured and for sale by B. T. BABBITT, 70 Nos. 63 and 65 Washington St., New York, and No. 35 Indiana Street, Boston.

PROTECTION AGAINST FIRE AND WATER.

N. MARSH'S CELEBRATED PATENT FIRE AND WATER PROOF.

No. 81 PEARL STREET, NEW YORK.

C. G. GUNTHER & SONS—FURS.—At their warehouse, 56 MAIDEN LANE, Have opened THEIR ENTIRE STOCK FOR THE SEASON OF MANUFACTURED FURS, Comprising all the leading and desirable styles, together with numerous articles in LADIES' FURS, GENTLEMEN'S FURS, CHILDREN'S FURS, AND FUR ROBES.

We solicit the inspection of the retail trade to the above, and offer our goods at the most advantageous prices. C. G. GUNTHER & SONS, 56 Maiden Lane.

MODERN SCHOOL FOR THE DRUM.—Containing Full Instructions and a choice selection of Music, for Line and Drum. By O. W. Keach & S. A. Burditt. Price 50 cents. Published by OLIVER DITSON & CO., Boston.

BUY your FURS of WILLIAMS, No. 293 FULTON STREET, BROOKLYN.

Wistar's Balsam of Wild Cherry.

This remedy has long been cherished by the community for its remarkable efficacy in relieving and curing the most obstinate, painful, and long-standing cases of COUGH, COLD, INFLUENZA, SORE THROAT, HOARSENESS, WHOOPING COUGH, CROUP, ASTHMA, INFLAMMATION of the LUNGS: while even CONSUMPTION itself has yielded to its magic influence, when all other known means have failed.

The whole history of this Balsam, which has now become a household word, proves that its virtues have produced so remedy approaching it in values and usefulness, while the future will hardly present one of such value.

To guard against Counterfeits, of which there are several worthless ones, see that each bottle has the written signature of I. BUTTS, as well as the plain name of the Proprietors, "Seth W. Fowle & Co., Boston," on the outside wrapper.

Sold by Druggists and Dealers everywhere.

Wistar's Balsam of Wild Cherry.

AGENTS WANTED in every County in the Union, to sell the Pictures of Mount Vernon and Capitol of the United States, printed in 13 colors. Address J. H. BUHAM & CO., 112 South Third Street, Philadelphia, Pa.

Agents Wanted

To obtain Subscribers for

LOSSING'S PICTORIAL FIELD-BOOK OF THE REVOLUTION.

In Two Volumes Royal Octavo, containing upward of 1500 Pages and 1100 Beautiful Illustrations.

This work will be SOLD EXCLUSIVELY BY AGENTS, to each of whom a special District will be given. Rare inducements offered. Persons should name the Counties they would prefer. For full particulars address GEO. W. ELLIOTT, care HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

American Guano.

TO FARMERS AND DEALERS

In Guano. This Guano from Jarvis Island, in the Pacific Ocean, which has been proved to be the most valuable fertilizer ever discovered, is offered for sale at wholesale and retail at less than two thirds the price of Peruvian. For particulars address A. S. MARSHALL, Pres. American Guano Co., 66 William Street, New York.

HARPER & BROTHERS, Franklin Square, New York,

Publish this Week:

I.

H A N D I E.

Being the First Volume of

Stories of Rainbow and Lucky.

By

JACOB ABBOTT.

Beautifully Illustrated. 16mo, Muslin, 50 cents.—Uniform with Abbott's FRANCONIA STORIES.

II.

PREACHERS AND PREACHING.

By the

Rev. NICHOLAS MURRAY, D.D.,

Author of Kirwan's "Letters to Bishop Hughes," "Romanism at Home," "The Happy Home," "Parish Punchings," &c.

12mo, Muslin, 75 cents.

We are sure this excellent volume will have a wide and useful circulation. Ministers and people will be equally profited by its perusal. In every parish and Sabbath School library it will be reaching minds that ought to be affected by its facts and appeals.—N. Y. Observer.

☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send either of the above Works by Mail, postage prepaid (to any part of the United States under 3000 miles), on receipt of the Money.

Singer's Sewing Machines.

SINGER'S NO. 2 SEWING MACHINE, $100.

SINGER'S NO. 1 FAMILY MACHINE, $90.

HEMMING GAUGES REDUCED TO $4.

Singer's Family Sewing Machines at $50 and $70 are capable of performing, in the best style, all the sewing of a family of five.

Send for a copy of I. M. Singer & Co.'s Gazette, which contains full and reliable information about prices, rivalries, &c., of Sewing Machines, and is sent to inquirers gratis.

I. M. SINGER & CO.,

No. 458 Broadway, New York.

361 BROADWAY 539

Tucker's Fleshers, Feathers, and Miscellaneous Items, Are all reliable.

Grover & Baker's

NOISELESS

Family Sewing Machines,

AT REDUCED PRICES

New York, Oct. 31, 1859.

The undersigned, Ministers and Laymen of the Methodist Episcopal Church, having examined and used in our families "GROVER AND BAKER'S CELEBRATED FAMILY SEWING MACHINE," take pleasure in recommending it as an instrument fully combining the essentials of a good, durable, and beautiful simplicity, ease of management, and the strength and elasticity of its stitch, unite to render it, in our opinion, a Machine unsurpassed by any in the market, and one which we feel confident will give satisfaction to all who may purchase and use it.

W. P. STRICKLAND, C. LABEY,
N. VANSANT, W. C. CHARTERTON,
R. R. YARD, W. A. GOODHUE,
S. ARNESS, W. ALLEN.

429 Broadway, New York; 18 Bond Street, Boston; 730 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia; 181 Baltimore Street, Baltimore; 19 Fourth Street, Cincinnati; 118 Montgomery Street, San Francisco; 35 Fratnin Street, Mobile; 11 Camp Street, New Orleans.

ALL MACHINES WARRANTED.

☞ SEND FOR A CIRCULAR. ☜

SANFORD'S HOT-AIR FURNACES.

PORTABLE OR SET IN BRICK.

THOUSANDS TESTIFY IN THEIR FAVOR.

SEND FOR A BOOK—FREE.

SANFORD'S RANGE AND COOK HEATER,

A favorite and economical stove of great power.

SEND FOR A BOOK.

SANFORD, TRUSLOW & CO.,

No. 223 Water Street, New York.

Two Works Valuable to the Sick or Well.

Sent by mail, on pay expected until received, read, and approved.

Address Dr. S. S. FITCH, 714 Broadway, New York.

Dr. SFT. FITCH on the causes and cure of Insanity, Nervousness, Heart Affection, and Skin diseases; Rheumatism, and Male and Female Complaints. On the mode of Preserving Health to 100 years. 413 pages; 26 Engravings. —Price 50 cents, in silver or P. O. stamps.

Sed. A work on the Cause and Cure of Diseases of the Eyes, Diseases, Liver, Bowels, and Kidneys; on Apoplexy, Palsy, and Dyspepsia; why we grow old and what causes sickness. 413 pages, 6 engravings. Price 50 cents. Say which book you wish, giving name, state, county town, and post office.

Garnet and Coral Jewelry. — We invite attention to our late importation of Coral and Garnet Jewelry, consisting of bracelets, brooches, ear-rings, necklaces, clasps, hair-pins, combs, lockets, clasps, &c.

OSBORN, BRADMAN & DOWNEY,
No. 337 Broadway, corner of Spring Street.

ANTI-ARTHRITIC WINE.—A CERTAIN CURE FOR GOUT AND RHEUMATISM. PENFOLD, PARKES & MOWER, Wholesale Druggists, 15 Beekman Street, New York.

Query's Cod-Liver Oil Jelly,

The only certain cure for Consumption, Asthma, and all kinds of Coughs, is taken without nausea.

Also,

Query's Patent Jellied Castor-Oil.—The most grateful exhibition of this oil is obviated, and it does not cause any constipation after use. Hide the best properties of Castor. To be had at the Inventor's Office, No. 135 Church Street, and at all respectable druggists. PENFOLD, PARKER & MOWER, Wholesale Agents, No. 15 Beekman Street.

Mercantile Record.

Patent Champion Safes.

B. C. Herring & Co., 251 Broadway.

Phelan's Billiard Tables.

O'Connor & Collender, 63 to 69 Crosby Street.

Wistar's Patent Salamander Safe.

B. G. Wilder & Co., 191 Broadway.

H. E. Dodsworth.—Music Store, 6 Astor Place.—Depot for Dunham's Pianos and Instruments.

SANDS' SARSAPARILLA.—In this preparation, we have all the restorative properties of the Sarsaparilla root, in combination with the strength and efficacy of Iodine. It speedily purifies the blood, restores to the stomach its healthful tone, and invigorates the entire organization.

Prepared and sold by A. B. & D. SANDS, Druggists, 100 Fulton Street, New York.

REMOVAL.

JAMES BOGARDUS,
Architect in Iron, Originator, Constructor, and Patentee of IRON BUILDINGS, Fronts and Manufacturer of
BOGARDUS'S ECCENTRIC UNIVERSAL MILL.
Machine Shops, corner of Centre and Lisp Streets,
(In Harlem Railroad Depot),
Office No. 521 Canal Street, near Centre, New York.
Iron Building corner Centre and Duane Sts., formerly occupied, but lately removed from Duane Street.

PIANO FORTES.

RAVEN, BACON & CO.,
N. Piano Forte Manufacturers, Warerooms No. 128 Grand Street, Broadway, where a full assortment of Instruments can be seen, exclusively of our manufacture. Warranted in every respect.

A CURIOSITY FOR EVERYBODY.

THE ILLUSTRATED SCRAP-BOOK.

JUST PUBLISHED.

THIS is a most entertaining and original work, containing FIVE HUNDRED PICTURES upon every conceivable subject of everyday life—wit, humor, pathos, natural history, scenery in all quarters of the globe, nationalities, types of character, monumentalities, portraits of noted individuals of both sexes; and in short, an inexhaustible resort for study and amusement for old and young.

THIS REAL NOVELTY

Is for sale at all of the principal bookstores for

TWENTY-FIVE CENTS PER COPY!

☞ Sent, postage paid, to any part of the country, on the receipt of twenty-five cents in postage stamps or silver.

PUBLISHED BY

JOHN J. DYER & CO.,

23 School Street, Boston.

GREAT NATIONAL PICTURE.

"The Home of Washington after the War."

Painted by ROSSITER and MIGNOT, now on Exhibition at the NATIONAL ACADEMY OF DESIGN.

Tenth Street, near Broadway,

From 9 A. M. to 5 P. M., and from 7 to 9 evening. Admission, 25 cents. J. McCLURE.

Ladd, Webster & Co.,

INVITE ATTENTION TO THEIR

IMPROVED TIGHT-STITCH

Sewing Machines,

WHICH FOR BEAUTY AND SIMPLICITY OF CONSTRUCTION, AND EFFICIENCY IN WORKING, ARE UNEQUALED BY ANY.

509 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.
17 SUMMER STREET, BOSTON.
820 CHESTNUT STREET, PHILADELPHIA.
232 BALTIMORE STREET, BALTIMORE.
80 WEST FOURTH STREET, CINCINNATI.

ALBERT WEBER, Piano-Forte Manufacturer, No. 112 Fourth Avenue, corner Canal St. The best assortment of PIANOS, warranted for three years, at the lowest prices. Call and examine before purchasing.

HIGHLY IMPORTANT TO BOTH SEXES.—DR. MARSH'S Remedy is based on the principle of Nature, and is the only one that will restore the sexual organs to their natural vigor. Circulars, containing over 100 pages, free, gratis, and sent by return mail. Address Dr. MARSH, Box 1,922, New York. Dr. MARSH'S Remedy is based on the principle of Nature, and is the only one that will restore the sexual organs to their natural vigor. Circulars, containing over 100 pages, free, gratis, and sent by return mail. Address Dr. MARSH, Box 1,922, New York.

Commencement of the Twentieth Volume.

HARPER'S NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE

FOR DECEMBER,

The present December commences the Twentieth Volume of HARPER'S NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE. In the literature of periodicals, it is ordained by the very Number, the Publishers announced their intention to present a periodical "which no one who had the slightest relish for miscellaneous reading, or for intelligence in the current literature of the progress and results of the literary genius of his own age, could willingly be without." And they are gratified to publish it at so low a rate, and to give it a value so much beyond its price, that it has found its way into the hands or the family circle of every intelligent citizen of the United States.

How far they have succeeded in carrying out their design the 19 Volumes of the Magazine already published will show. Each of those contains as much matter as an ordinary octavo book, illustrated with Engravings in the style of the Magazine, at less than dollars. The Monthly Numbers of the Magazine are now regularly issued to a library of more than a Hundred Volumes, comprising the best Literature of the Day, and forming a Complete Cyclopedia, and a Text-book of the Age.

Without entering into a comparison with other American periodicals, the Publishers may modestly say that HARPER'S MAGAZINE contains 75 per cent more matter than HARPER'S, PUTNAM'S, or the CRITIC'S Monthly Magazine. While giving place to many of the best productions of European Novelists and Essayists, HARPER'S MAGAZINE regularly furnishes a larger amount of original matter than is contained in any other periodical, whether European or American. It has published articles from more than 70 different American writers, residing in every section, and including almost every State in the Union. The Publishers have reason to feel very proud of the fact that they have collected and periodically presented the Magazine from assuming a sectional character. Of becoming the vehicle of any "sectional admiration" slops or party.

As an Illustrated Periodical, HARPER'S is wholly without a rival. The volumes already published have contained more than Three Thousand Pictures, most of them executed in the highest style of the art, from Original Drawings by the best Artists, BETWEEN FIFTY AND SIXTY WOOD-CUTTERS, THOMAS, HOPPIN, CHAPIN, LOSSING, VOSS, DARLEY, BILLINGS, and others, have been employed. Many of the Pictures have cost more than One Hundred and Twenty Thousand Dollars. Many of the Engravings have been executed by artists specially retained this account. HARPER'S MAGAZINE is not fortnightly, or less than quarterly, but more than a Quarter of a Million of Dollars to American Authors and Artists.

The Publishers gratefully acknowledge that this large outlay has been amply remunerated by the most sanguine expectations. They heard from the first that the Magazine would be welcomed into the bosom of the family circle of every intelligent citizen of the United States, "from the Lakes to the Gulf, and from ocean to ocean." They anticipated. They believe that the publication of the Magazine will continue to increase with the growth and progress of the country, and, in the spirit in which it was commenced, it will hereafter be conducted, doing not only its better part, but the best interests of the Volume already issued.

While the Magazine will continue to be sustained by the writers whose papers have gained for it its distinctive character, a hearty welcome will be given to new Authors. Almost every Number has introduced fresh names to the list of writers for the public; and from this their list of Contributors will be yet more enlarged.

TERMS.

One Copy for One Year $3 00
Two Copies for One Year 5 00
Three or more Copies for One Year (each) 2 00
And an Extra Copy, gratis, for every Club of Five.
SUBSCRIBERS.

HARPER'S WEEKLY and HARPER'S MAGAZINE, together, one year, $4 00.

The Postage upon "HARPER'S MAGAZINE" must be paid at the Office where it is received. The Postage is Thirty-six Cents per year.

HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A FIRST-CLASS ILLUSTRATED PAPER.

PRINTED BEST AND PUBLISHED

FAMILY NEWSPAPER IN THE WORLD.

FIVE CENTS A NUMBER: $2 50 A YEAR.

MR. CURTIS, the EDITOR'S EASY CHAIR writer, called it "TALE OF TWO CITIES," splendidly Illustrated by THOMAS and others, announced in HARPER'S WEEKLY for May 7, and will be continued from week to week until completed.

GEO. WILLIAM CURTIS'S Illustrated Serial Tale of NULLAH, also entitled "TRUMPS," was commenced in HARPER'S WEEKLY for April 9.

TERMS OF HARPER'S WEEKLY.

One Copy for Twenty Weeks $1 00
One Copy for Six Months 2 00
One Copy for Two Years 4 00
One Copy for One Year 2 00
Twelve Copies for One Year 20 00
Twenty-five Copies for One Year 40 00

Two Copies will be allowed for every Club of TWENTY or TWENTY-FIVE SUBSCRIBERS.

TERMS FOR ADVERTISING.—Fifty Cents a Line.

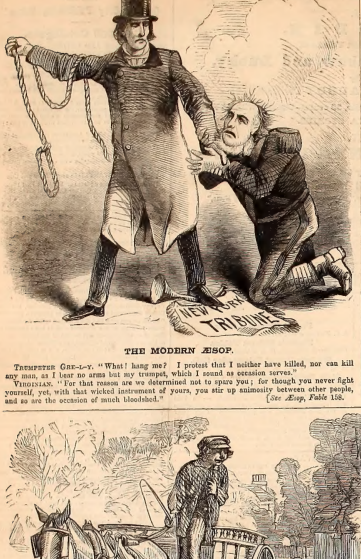
A Liberal Discount will be made to those wishing to advertise for three Months or more.

 Persons living in the City of New York wishing "HARPER'S WEEKLY" left at their houses, will please send their names and residences, with the subscription money, to the Office of Publication.

HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers,
Franklin Square, New York.

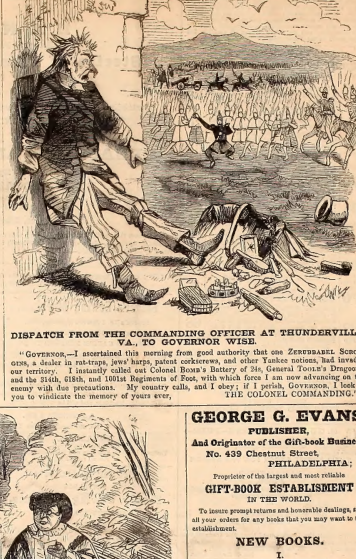


THE MODERN ÆSOP.

TREMPSTER GRE-LEY. "What! hang me? I protest that I neither have killed, nor can kill any man, as I lear no arms but my trumpet, which I sound as occasion serves."

VIRGINIAN. "For that reason are we determined not to spare you; for though you never fight yourself, yet, with that wicked instrument of yours, you stir up animosity between other people, and so are the occasion of much bloodshed."

[See Æsop, Fable 158.



DISPATCH FROM THE COMMANDING OFFICER AT THUNDERVILLE, VA., TO GOVERNOR WISE.

"GOVERNOR,—I ascertained this morning from good authority that one ZERUBBABEL SCROGGINS, a dealer in rat-traps, jews'-harps, patent corkscrews, and other Yankee notions, had invaded our territory. I instantly called out Colonel BOMB'S Battery of 24s, General TOOLE'S Dragoons, and the 214th, 618th, and 1001st Regiments of Foot, with which force I am now advancing on the enemy with due precautions. My country calls, and I obey; if I perish, GOVERNOR, I look to you to vindicate the memory of yours ever,

THE COLONEL COMMANDING."

BUTCHER'S BOY. "Is it from FREDERICK, my dear? (Old Lady looks up amazed) Ah! you smile, I see it in."

481 BROADWAY.

GREAT SALE of RICH SILKS

1500 Pieces New Styles,

At 75 cents per yard.

REDUCED FROM $1 25.

1000 Pieces Extra Quality

ONLY $1 00 PER YARD.

REDUCED FROM $1 75.

Observe the name and number,

G. M. BODINE,

No. 481 Broadway.

ASTHMA.—We can not, we believe, render to these of our readers who suffer, from the Asthma, a greater service than by inviting their attention to the advertisement of Jones Wistcomb's Remedy in another column.

THE SIMPLE AND BEAUTIFUL ART of transferring Pictures and Engravings on to Glass, Marble, &c. Sixteen 13 cents or five letter stamps. C. H. HUNTER, Box 346 P.O., Newark, N. J.

WARM CLOTHING.

We now offer large assortments of Fall and Winter Clothing, just manufactured, in our best styles, consisting in part of

ESQUIMAUX BEAVERS,
MOSCOW BEAVERS,
KIDDE DOWN BEAVERS,
MAGENTA BEAVERS,
PRESIDENT BEAVERS,
CLARENDON BEAVERS,
DREADNAUGHT BEAVERS.

Also, complete suits of all styles of CASSIMERE and Beaver suits, and all the late styles Velvet and Cashmere Vestings, &c., &c.

BOYS' CLOTHING
AND FURNISHING GOODS

in great variety, at the lowest prices of the trade.

D. DEVLIN & CO.,
Nos. 259, 259, and 260 Broadway.

Café de Costa Rica
C&C

cuts SUPERIOR Strong-bodied delicately-flavored
Mountain COFFEE,
For sale by
CUTHELL & Co
No. 5 Beaver Street.

Overcoats—$3 50, $4, $4 50, $5 50, $6 50, $10 and $12.
BUSINESS COATS—$7 50, $8 50, $4 50, $5 50 & $12.
PANTS and VESTS—$1 to $12. Gents' Furnishing Goods, at GEO. A. HUNTER & CO.'S
Mammoth Clothing Stores,
Nos. 209 and 211 Bowery.

Sheldon & Company's Holiday List
OF Juvenile Books.

The Florence Stories;
OR, INSTRUCTIONS AT HOME
A NEW SERIES OF JUVENILES.
By the Rev. JACOB ABBOTT,
Author of the "Rollo Books," "Rollo's Travels," "Franconia Stories," &c.

Vol. I. FLORENCE and JOHN. Beautifully Illustrated from Designs by Hertick.
1 vol. 16mo, price 60 cents. (Ready Dec. 1st.)

The Oakland Series.
By Geo. B. TAYLOR, of Virginia. Vol. I. KENNY. 1 Vol. 16mo. Illustrated after Designs by Lumley. Price 55 cents. (Ready Dec. 1st.)

The Old Battle Ground.
A new volume by J. T. TROWBRIDGE (Paul Creyton), Author of "Neighbor Jackwood," "Father Brighthope," &c., &c. 1 vol. 16mo, uniform. Price 50 cents. (Ready Dec. 1st.)

The Geldart Series.
By Mrs. Thomas Geldart.
FIVE CHOICE VOLUMES.
16mo. Price of each.....50 cents.
The same, gilt.....80 cents.

Early orders from the trade solicited.

GEORGE G. EVANS,
PUBLISHER,
And Originator of the Gift-book Business,
No. 439 Chestnut Street,
PHILADELPHIA;
Proprietor of the largest and most reliable
GIFT-BOOK ESTABLISHMENT
IN THE WORLD.

To insure prompt returns and honorable dealings, send all your orders for any books that you may want to this establishment.

NEW BOOKS.

I.
MEMOIRS OF ROBERT HOUDIN,
Magician. One Volume, 12mo, Cloth, Price $1 00.

II.
BOOK OF PARLOR PLAYS. By SILAS S. STEELE. One Volume, 12mo, Cloth, Price $1 00.

III.
BOOK OF HUMOROUS POETRY.
One Volume, 12mo, Cloth, Price $1 00.

IV.
H. STOWELL BROWN'S LECTURES.
One Volume, 12mo, Cloth, Price $1 00.

V.
LIFE OF COL. DAVID CROCKETT.
One Volume, 12mo, Cloth, Price $1 00.

VI.
LIVES OF SOUTHERN HEROES AND PATRIOTS. One Volume, 12mo, Cloth, Price $1 00.

VII.
THE PRINCE OF THE HOUSE OF DAVID. By the Rev. J. H. INGRAHAM, LL.D. (New Edition.) One Volume, 12mo, Cloth, Price $1 25.
☞ The same in German, Price $1 00.

VIII.
THE PILLAR OF FIRE. By Rev. J. H. INGRAHAM, LL.D. One Volume 12mo, Cloth. Price $1 25.

Upon receiptance of the prices of the Book, and 21 cents additional for postage, copies of either of the above, accompanied with a handsome present, will be sent to any address in the United States.

IF YOU ARE IN WANT OF A BOOK
Send to
GEORGE G. EVANS'
Gift Book Establishment,
No. 439 Chestnut Street,
PHILADELPHIA.
Where you can get
BOOKS IN EVERY DEPARTMENT OF LITERATURE,
AND A HANDSOME PRESENT,
Worth from Fifty Cents to One Hundred Dollars, is given with each Book sold.

SEND FOR A CATALOGUE OF BOOKS,
Which will be sent free of any expense whatever to any address.
One trial will assure you, that the best place in the country to buy Books is at
GEORGE G. EVANS',
No. 439 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION

VOL. III.—No. 154.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, DECEMBER 10, 1859. [PRICE FIVE CENTS.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1859, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

THE LATE WASHINGTON IRVING.

THE city was shocked on Tuesday last by the news that Washington Irving was no more. He had been seen at church on Sunday, and had spent the evening of Monday, as usual, with his family; at ten o'clock that evening he arose, bade his family good-night, and with the aid of his niece proceeded to his room. He was not well, and had complained all day of a pain in his side and of general languor, but there was nothing in his condition of health which justified immediate alarm. Scarcely, however, had he reached his room-door when he fell heavily to the ground. He was speedily raised and medical assistance sought, but he never spoke or moved. His spirit had fled. Thus died Washington Irving, at the age of seventy-six.

He was born in William Street, between John and Fulton streets, in the city of New York, in the year which has been rendered memorable by the peace of Versailles; so that he was, so to speak, coeval, and, among eminent men, one of the few surviving coevals, of his country. Indeed, as he was born in April, while the peace of Versailles was only signed in November, he may be said to have been older than his country.

His father was a Scotchman, a man of some means, and gave his sons a fair education. One of them, Peter, became an editor—a pretty poor business in those dark days; Washington, a youngest son, was trained for the bar. He never practiced; though, after some desultory studies, he appears to have been duly admitted to the profession. At the age of twenty-one his health gave way, and he left this country on a tour through Europe. He visited France, Italy, Holland, and Great Britain, and returned in 1806, thoroughly restored. He had, before his departure, contributed some papers, over the signature of "Jonathan Oldstyle," to the Morning Chronicle, his brother's paper; the popularity they obtained induced him to start a new satirical paper, in concert with J. K. Paulding and others, under the title of "Salmagundi." This publication, which was modeled on the Spectator and its compers, lived a year, and is still remembered by literary men.

It was in 1808 that Mr. Irving wrote the work on which his fame will rest—"Knickerbocker's History of New York." This interesting volume will be read as long as fine humor and good taste are appreciated among us. Its title has become literally a household word.—Steamboats and stages, banks and citizens have appropriated the name of Knickerbocker. At this very time one of the most popular writers of New England is writing a very pale imitation of Washington Irving's famous history. Diedrich Knickerbocker's story was not only original, it was very amusing, and grotesquely truthful in respect of manners and customs; in the form of a romance it contained numerous effective hits at reigning follies and vices, and left a picture on the mind which did no great violence to history. It is, we think, the magnum opus of Mr. Irving.

Its success was immediate, both in this country and abroad. In a pecuniary point of view, however, successful literatures was at that time even a poorer resource than it is at present. Mr. Irving would have made little by his triumph had it not been for his brothers, who were at that time leading merchants in the Liverpool trade. They were naturally proud of their brother, and gave him an interest in their business on condition that he was to devote himself to letters, and to take no share in the management of the house beyond drawing his proportion of the profits. Their liberality was well requited. In 1819 they failed and went to pieces; and they are best remembered, and their children most distinguished by their connection with Washington Irving.

During the war of 1812 Mr. Irving had made a brief essay of the military career. He had obtained an appointment on the staff of that eminently pacific personage, the Governor of New York, and had won the cheap title of Colonel. But it does not appear that he was ever under fire. He found himself in a more congenial element after the war, when the failure of his brothers' firm compelled him to rely on his literary resources, and "The Sketch-book" appeared. It is quite painful to read in the newspapers elaborate eulogies on the publisher Murray—who actually paid the author five hundred dollars—the sale of the work (of which he had purchased the copyright from the original owner for $1000) having exceeded his expectations. True, in this hard money-getting age, any man who pays $500 dollars over and above what he bargained deserves especial mention; but think of earning immortality and the title of a benefactor of Washington Irving for a sum which many a wealthy speculator or merchant spends for a dinner every day or two!

From the age of thirty till he was considerably over forty Mr. Irving resided in Europe, alternately in England, France, and Spain. During that period he wrote and published most of the works which his admirers now read. "Bracebridge Hall," "Tales of a Traveller," "Life of Columbus," "Conquest of Granada," "Tales of the Alhambra," etc., all appeared during this period, and, without exception, achieved remarkable success both at home and abroad. Mr. Irving was able to do what few authors can achieve at the present time; he enjoyed a copyright in England and in the United States, and with the profits of his sales in both countries was enabled to lead a life of agreeable bachelor leisure. Accident gave him the entrée of the best literary society in foreign countries. He was a friend of the Irish bard Tommy Moore, and of the Scotch Tories Campbell and Walter Scott; he also associated, on terms of close intimacy, with true and noble disciples of literature, such as Lord John Russell and Lord Brougham. His mental calibre, to tell the truth, was hardly equal to that of the great Edinburgh Review school; but his genial nature, his foreign birth, and his agreeable style and manners, enabled him to become a member of their coterie without being taxed toward supporting the burden they bore.

In 1832 the United States (as has since occurred) felt the necessity of imparting some respectability to their diplomatic appointments, and Washington Irving was named Secretary of Legation to London. The appointment gave offense in some quarters, as Mr. Irving was at the time much more of a foreigner in his tastes and style than an American. So just a concession to letters, however, ultimately met public approval.—While in England he received fifty-guinea prize for historical composition. He was likewise created Doctor of Laws by the University of Oxford.

In 1842 he obtained, without solicitation, the appointment to Madrid as United States Minister. This was before the Cuba excitement, and the post of Minister to Madrid was comparatively a sinecure. His tenure of office is well remembered, however, by Amer-lean travelers in Spain, who enjoyed his hospitalities and the delight of intercourse with so refined and genial a man.

THE LATE WASHINGTON IRVING AT SUNNYSIDE.

He returned to the United States in 1848. He had previously published the acquaintance he won on the heart of the great equitable John Jacob Astor, whose dream of a Pacific Empire he had partially foreshadowed in his "Astoria." Until the death of that energetic man Mr. Irving enjoyed the closest intimacy with him. It is not easy to conceive two men more dissimilar; the one, hardheaded, practical, systematic, acquisitive; the other, romantic, superlative in his refinement, ignorant of business, and not covetous of money. Yet they were friends, and each esteemed the other, and even loved each other. At his death Astor appointed Washington Irving a trustee of his will, for Library and one of his executors, appropriating a fund out of which each executor was to have a salary of $5000 a year until their duties were discharged.

The last years of his life Mr. Irving spent peacefully and happily at his place, Sunnyside, on the Hudson. It is a charming residence, admirably fitted for the use of poetic tastes and elegant leisure. Here he wished away the evening of his life in agreeable intercourse with admiring friends, and in congenial companionship with the books he loved. In order not to be idle he wrote a "Life of Washington," which, while it can not repair the void that is felt in our literature, and does not provide us with a suitable biography of the hero of this nation, will ever remain an agreeable, pleasant book, and will be read perhaps as widely and as long as a more truly valuable and worthy work on the subject.

We can not do better than close this brief sketch with the following extracts from an account written by Mr. Tilton of a late visit to Sunnyside:

"Mr. Irving is not at all looking as one would expect who knew his age. I noticed him as in the winter of life; I found him only in its Indian summer. He came down stairs, and walked through the hall into the bookparlor, with a firm and lively step that might well have made one doubt whether he had truly attained his seventy-seventh year. He was suffering from asthma, and was muffled against the damp air with a flannel shawl, wrapped like a great loose scarf around his neck; but as he took his seat in the old arm-chair, and, despite his hoarseness and troubled chest, began so unexpectedly vivacious conversation, he made me almost forget that he was the guest of an old man long past his 'three-score years and ten.'

"His literary employments, he remarked, had always been more like entertainments than tasks.

"'Some writers,' said he, 'appear to have been independent of mood. Sir Walter Scott, for instance, had great power of writing, and could work almost at any time; so could Coleridge, with this difference: Scott always, and Coleridge seldom, wrote well. I remember,' said he, 'taking breakfast one morning with Rogers, Moore, and Crabbe; the conversation turned upon Byron's poetic moods; Crabbe said that, however it might be with Lord Byron, as for himself he could write as well one time as another. But,' said Irving, with a twinkle of humor suggesting the listener, 'Crabbe has written a great deal that nobody can read.'

"He mentioned that while living in Paris the following period without being able to write. 'I sat down repeatedly,' said he, 'with pen and paper, to avoid incurring wrath putting on the paper. At length I left Paris for Dresden, who thronged in one town, big, that now, after long waiting, I had the mood, and would hold it, and work it out as long as it would last, until I had sewing my books done. So I began to write steadily after breakfast, and continued, without noticing how the time was passing, until Moore came in again at four in the afternoon, when I had experienced exercise the table with freshly-written sheets. I kept the mood almost without interruption for six weeks.'

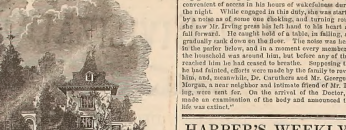
"I asked which of his books was the result of this frenzy; he replied, 'Bonnibridge Hall.'

"Some of your works,' I remarked, 'are more charming than the biography of Goldsmith.'

"'Yet that was written,' said he, 'even more rapidly than the other.' He then added:

"'When I have been engaged on a continuous work, I have often been obliged to rise in the middle of the night, light my lamp, and write an hour or two, to relieve my mind; and how that I write no more, I am sometimes compelled to get up to the same way to read.'

"Sometimes, also, as the last Idlewild letter intimated, he gets up to shave!



"'When I was in Spain,' he remarked, 'searching the old chronicles, and engaged on the Life of Columbus, I often wrote fourteen or fifteen hours out of the twenty-four.'

"He said that whenever he had forced his mind unwillingly to work the product was worthless, and he invariably threw it away and began again; 'for,' he observed, 'the essay or chapter had been the mood, and the ad est is seldom good for any thing. An author's right time to work is when his mind is aglow; when his imagination is kindled. Then are his pressure moments; but him that will exist they come, but when they have come let him not neglect them.'

"On the parlor wall hung the engraving of Faed's picture of Scott and his Contemporaries. I alluded to it as presenting a group of his former friends.

"'Yes,' said he, 'I knew every man of them but three; and now they are all gone.'

"'Are the portraits good?' I inquired.

"'Scott's head,' he replied, 'is well drawn, though the expression lacks something of Scott's force; Campbell's is tolerable; Lockhart's is the worst. Lockhart,' said he, 'was a man of very infirm temperament, but he had a more manly look than in the picture.'

"'You should write one more book,' I hinted.

"'What is that?'

"'Your reminiscences of these literary friends.'

"'Ah!' he exclaimed, 'it is too late now. I shall never take the pen again; I have so entirely given up writing, that even my letters have been unanswered. I must have rest. No more books now!'

"He referred to his work, a week before, from Mr. Wells, whose letter he had just been reading in the Home Journal.

"'I am most glad,' said he, 'that Mr. Willis remembered my request. Both he and Mr. Greeley are kind enough; they take such good care of me that really I am the most petted old bachelor in the country.' Then, with a twinkle with a merry emphasis, 'the most fortunate old bachelor in the country.'

"It was delightful to witness the animation of his manner, and to observe how appreciative, as he continued to relate how they supplied all his wants, and how his kindnesses at the right time, without troubling him to look at the clock for himself. And his face, as he looked—looked and shouted him for his morning ride, although he had for his first weather walk—and in every possible way honored him in every possible manner.

"'I call them sometimes my nieces,' he said, 'but often not my daughters.'

"As I rose to go, he brought from a corner of the room a photograph of a little girl, exhibiting it with great enthusiasm. It was a gift from a little child who had come to see him every day during his sickness. The picture was accompanied with a note, printed in large letters, with a full pencil, by the little correspondent, as she said she was too young to write! He spoke with great vivacity of the child, saying, 'Children,' said he, 'all of them, are great pets: I am very fond of the little creatures.'

"The author's study—into which I looked for a few moments by the open door—was a small room, almost entirely filled by the great writing-table and its chair. Behind it, the walls are laden with books and pictures, and before it—directly opposite every day by some delicate hand: for none of the books were tumbled into a corner, and no pamphlets were thrown upon the table. The pen, too, was laid precisely parallel to the edge of the writing-desk, exactly which only a wearingly loving keeper would persevere to maintain! Besides, there was not a speck of dust upon carpet or cushion."

A writer in the Times thus describes his last hours:

"During the morning of Monday he walked out to his garden, a short distance from the house, and gave some instructions to his gardener. He also gave instructions that a certain tree should be cut down, as it was shutting off a view in his library. He did not rate out during the day, but remained in the house in the enjoyment of conversing in animated, conversation, and reading. In addition to the members of his family, there were present Ebenezer Irving, the brother of the deceased, with his three daughters, and Pierre M. Irving, a nephew, with his wife, another nephew, Rev. Pierre M. Irving of New Brighton, Staten Island, the literary executor of the deceased, was also present, having accidentally come up from Staten Island that day. The evening was spent according to the proposal of Mr. Irving, and excepting an occasional reference to his difficulty of breathing, none of the party appeared more cheerful, or a more gratified sharer of the enjoyment than he. In the intervals of conversation he glanced over the pages of several books that lay on the centre-table, and the last book he is believed to have opened was Lieutenant Page's 'History of the Paraguay Expedition.' About 10½ o'clock he rose to retire, and walked to the lower of the two-story, he also ended the stairs alone to his bedroom. While upon the steps he met his nephew, Rev. Mr. Irving, coming down, holding in his hand a needle for sewing manuscript. Mr. Irving took him in a playful manner, saying: 'Why, Pierre, what are you doing with a needle?' and patted on it his cross. These were the last words he ever uttered. One of his nieces, Miss Sarah Irving, had preceded him to his room, and when he entered she was engaged in arranging his books so that they would be convenient of access in his hours of wakefulness during the night. While engaged in this duty, she was startled by a noise as if some one was choking, and turning round she saw Mr. Irving press his left hand to his heart and fall forward. He caught hold of a table in falling, and gradually sank down on the floor. The noise was heard by the parlor below, and in a moment every member of the household was around him, but before any of them reached him he had ceased to breathe. Suspecting that he had fainted, efforts were made by the family to revive him, and, meanwhile, Dr. Carruthers and Mr. George D. Morgan, a near neighbor and intimate friend of Mr. Irving, were sent for. On the arrival of the Doctor, he made an examination of the body and announced that life was extinct."

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 10, 1859.

THE MEETING OF CONGRESS.

CONGRESS meets next week, and, as usual, a mass of property are unsure on the subject. Judging from the newspapers, one might fairly expect a dissolution of the Union before the end of the session. We do not look for that event quite so soon.

It is probable that the Republicans will control the House of Representatives. They do not possess a clear majority, but with the aid of a few stray Americans and Douglas Democrats they would do so, and these can be had. It seems to be supposed in some quarters in the South that the Republicans in the Opposition party will naturally lead to a ferocious attack on the vested rights of the Southern States. We confess that we do not look for any thing of the kind. It is quite likely that a large number of very severe speeches will be made against slavery by Republican members. But while Southern delegations are foaming with rage at them, the chances are that various money bills and the appropriations will be quietly passed through; after which it is likely that the Northern members will be found less uncompromising on the subject of slavery. The Slave Question will doubtless be a staple topic; but, if the honest men are not sharp, he will serve as a cover for grants of various kinds, and in the form of sectional strife Congressional rogues will reap a handsome harvest.

As to dissolution, both parties know too much for any thing of the kind. Party newspapers in both sections, seeking to curry favor with the masses by their violence, may sometimes operate about dissolving the Union; but the military force which quelled the Harper's Ferry insurrection—the United States marines—will be sufficient to keep the real disunionists in check wherever they appear. Whatever people may think, the majority of this nation are not yet at the mercy of a few country editors.

The practical questions which will be brought before Congress next session relate to the tariff and the banks. We are led to believe that the President will recommend such an alteration in the tariff as will enable him to pay off the Treasury notes, and perhaps a part of the loan which he has forced entries from officers. It is not likely that Congress will act upon any such suggestion. The revenue at present is, or ought to be, in excess of the expenditure; and it is better to pay off our debts by increasing economy than by adding to the taxes. It is also likely that the President will repeat his recommendation of a bankrupt law for banks and other corporations. We sincerely trust that something will be done on this subject. The banks, as well in this as in the sister cities (with the single exception of New Orleans), are at present administered for the stockless interest, with a short-sighted view to dividends alone. Their alternate expansion and contraction exercises an unwholesome influence, particularly at once on trade. They expand when expansion is not required by the commercial interests of the country, thereby into an insane competition with private lenders; and they contract when the commerce of the United States really requires assistance. They brought on the crisis of 1857 by their unwise policy; and since the extraordinary and illegal conduct of the banks relieved them from the penalties of a suspension of specie payments they have become still bolder and more reckless. It is now nearly clear that they are ready to force a new check on their career, and to provide a guarantee against fresh suspensions. The bankrupt law recommended by the President would attain the end desired.

These are the really momentous measures which will be brought before Congress. It remains to be seen whether the slavery discussion and the private jobs will leave room for their proper ventilation. The experience of the coming session will afford a fair test of the amount of disinterested virtue and practical patriotism which are still to be found among our public men.

WASHINGTON'S FAREWELL ADDRESS.

OUR readers are aware that a controversy, somewhat painful in some of its relations, has existed for many years with regard to the authorship of Washington's Farewell Address. We are happy to state that the question is decisively resolved, and the controversy we trust forever ended, by Mr. Horace Binney's "Inquiry into the Formation of Washington's Farewell Address" (Philadelphia, 1859, 8vo).

Whether Washington had or had not the aid of Hamilton in the preparation of the Farewell Address was a fact of little, if any, importance. But the unfortunate way in which it has been treated has given it a gravity quite apart from its intrinsic interest; for, as Mr. Binney remarks in his preface, the composition of the Address has been regarded "by some persons either as an unsupported claim on the side of Hamilton, or as an assistance which he should have reflected means to conceal forever; and by others, as a transcript by Washington, with a view to unmerciful honor, of what should had written, fundamental or guiding thoughts and all." But while the framing of the question upon the honor of these two great names is, at present, its most important feature, its decision has, besides, a definite historical value, which must come more prominently into view as the personal interests, or rather insinuations, which first suggested the "Inquiry," sink into forgetfulness.

Mr. Binney's "Inquiry" is conducted throughout with rare critical acuteness, and with a still rarer impartiality. He treats the question as a judge, not as an advocate. The dignity and elevation of his tone in stating and deciding the case, are only excelled by his tenderness and delicacy toward all the parties, dead or living, who may in any way be concerned in the solution of the question. Having under his eye documents unknown to Judge Story and Mr. Sparks, he is able to show, without in the slightest degree reflecting upon the judgment or honesty of those distinguished writers, that their conclusions necessarily partook of the imperfection of their data.

The case may be briefly summed up as follows: In 1792 Washington, intending to withdraw from office at the close of his first term, decided to make this purpose, and his grounds, in a "Farewell Address." On the 20th of May he requested Madison to prepare the paper, and suggested certain topics which, "among others," might "be observed." Mr. Madison, accordingly, drew up a brief paper, which is still in existence. Washington, however, at that time gave up his purpose of abandoning public life. Four years elapsed, he reviewed it, and, with it, the plan of an address. He framed a "draft" of such an address himself, and showed it to Alexander Hamilton, in the spring of 1796, requesting him to "review" it. On May 10th Hamilton wrote to Washington, making a copy of the draft, and stating that he had "much at leisure touched and retouched." On the 15th Washington sent it, authorizing Hamilton, if he could think it best, "even to throw the whole into a different form." On the 30th of July Hamilton sent an address, drawn up by himself, embodying all the views suggested by Washington with great care, and adopting his very words as much as possible, but giving a new and much extended plan to the paper. On the 10th August he sent back Washington's own draft, carefully revised. On the 26th Washington, after a brief delay, retained his adoption of the new draft (Hamilton's), and requesting him to "re-examine and return it as soon as possible." On the 30th of September Hamilton returned it, with a few alterations. The "Farewell Address," as now known to the world, was signed by Washington on the 17th of September, and was published on the 19th.

Mr. Binney gives the correspondence and drafts in full, with a minute and most exhaustive analysis of every part of them, so far as it bears upon the question. His conclusion is that "Washington was the originator of the original designer of the Farewell Address, not merely by general intimation, but by the suggestion of particular topics, and even of the order of topics, and of a general outline, the same which the paper now exhibits." The Address "speaks the voice" of Washington; the fundamental thoughts and principles were his; but he was not the composer or writer of the paper. . . . The new plan, the different form, proceeded from Hamilton. He put together the thoughts of Washington in a new order, and with a new bearing; and while, as often as he could, he used the words of Washington, his own language was good and effective, both of his own thoughts and for the expansion and development of Washington's thoughts. . . . But no Jesuitism has appeared, no new cast appear, to break or mar the image and superscription of Washington, which it bears, or to sully the principles of moral and political action in the government of a nation which are reflected from it with his entire approval, and were, in fundamental points, dictated by himself."

The public mind, we think, will rest in this conclusion. We thank Mr. Binney, not only for his calm investigation and conclusive scrutiny ment of a question about which a needless and annoying controversy had arisen, but also for the beautiful illustrations which his book affords of the inner feelings and relations between the two wisest names in American history, Washington and Hamilton. Each knew his own worth and wisdom; but each knew still better those of the other. Where either recognized the other's superiority he leaned upon it with unqualified trust, but with no abasement of self-respect or dignity. Hamilton's cool and mind of studies made him far more the literary man; the accidents and exigencies of his life made him far more the politician than Washington ever was. Washington knew all this; and hence sought and used Hamilton's aid with the utmost freedom when ever his literary or political talent was needed in the public service. The extent to which he depended upon Hamilton in these respects is well known to all who have investigated the matter. Nothing can be more absurd than to consider the fact any disparagement to the greatest man in the history of modern time. This is to estimate Washington by a standard of which he knew nothing. As if he, whose single and lofty aim it was to shape his administration for the best good of the country, had any of the petty vanities of "literary authorship!" Hamilton's aid was rendered freely always with a just apprehension of the relations between him and his great chief, and always with the strict regard to delicacy and honor which was characteristic of his noble nature. He was a cadet in the building up of an empire, not of a literary reputation. States-men, on whose acts a nation's welfare and the world's destiny turns, have no time to thought to waste in adjusting, either for themselves or for posterity, "the credit of a composition" to which they have contributed together.

OUR TREATY WITH CHINA.

THE State Department informs us, through an authorized organ, that the United States treaty with China is all that could be wished, and that the English stories about its imperfections and omissions are false. It will be a better able to judge of the truth or falsehood of the assertion when the ratified treaty is before us. In the mean time, the letter from our envoy-correspondent, which we lay before our readers in this number, will afford every one a judge of the measure of respect and civility awarded to our representative by the government officials of China. It seems that our envoy-trymen traveled to Pekin, if not in a box, in several boxes, at imminent risk to life and limb, that if not prisoners, their reception like incoming, and their resting on the way were regulated by a Chinese official; that, at Pekin, they were practically prisoners, without any means of traveling round the city, and confined to their court-yard and square house; that, finally, Mr. Ward was permitted to present to the Emperor of China, or to approach any nearer to the ward regular diplomatic intercourse than his predecessors had done before him.

This, it must be admitted, is not very encouraging. If our neutrality is only going to secure us hauteur of the kind, it is not worth much. If, when a friendly American wants to visit the court to which he is accredited, he is to be caught in carry-whirl springs, to be hurried in vilely-smelling junks, and over vilely paved roads, at the will of a mandarin, to the Chinese capital; if there he is to be immured in a sort of a Chinese prison, and hustled out of the city as soon as a pretext for his expulsion can be found, can we venture to hope that will be the treatment of the enemies of China?

The simple fact is, the Chinese have no idea whatever of our modes of dealing, and not the faintest notion of fairness in political transactions. Commercial treaty is so grand a step not in the least appreciate the value of friendly intercourse with any foreign nation. All foreigners they despise equally; like blind men with colors, they do not care to and can not discriminate between the barbarians who seek them for purposes of trade. They have tolerated the entry of foreign vessels at their ports because experience has taught them that to exclude them would be to lose a valuable source of revenue. But foreign ships and foreign men are only just suffered at the Chinese ports because the Chinese could not help it; they can not help themselves. As to privileges beyond those which force exacts, China will grant none. Mandarins sign treaties, and, like the British treaty of 1846, do not even take the trouble to send them to Pekin; and mandarins escort embassadors to the capital, but when the latter have got there, they find that, so far as practical results are concerned, they might as well have stuck at home. Every kind of subterfuge and trick is freely used to defeat the objects of the Christian nations which seek intercourse with China. Promises, bargains, covenants, and treaties—all are professedly tendered by the Chinese, and all are equally valueless.

We still adhere to the opinion that there exists no substantial cause of war with China. We have no grievances to set forth; nothing has occurred which would justify the United States Executive in incurring the great expense of a Chinese war. But it is well that the public should bear in mind that the great problem as to the right of a nation to shut itself out from commercial intercourse with the rest of the world remains yet to be solved, not only with regard to Japan, but with China also. Mr. Ward's treaty will probably be found to be not worth the paper it is written on. Our trade with China will continue to be carried on, as heretofore, by means of British, German, until further lessons initiate the Chinese into our methods of dealing with men. We submit that, during this probationary period, decency should dictate moderation in our abuse of protectorate, the English.

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE AURORA AUSTRALIS.

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly:

UNITED STATES STEAMER "LEVIATHAN,"
PANAMA, Aug. 30, 1859.

HAVING observed in the Weekly of 1st October a notice of the very general appearance of a beautiful aurora Australis in the northern hemisphere about the 1st of September, I presumed you would be glad to receive from me the following notice, both as your own account, as taking an interest in everything beautiful and strange in nature, and as an event of much importance, that might confirm or limit therefrom. At about 1 A.M., September 2, the ship Leviathan, 2,700 tons, 400 feet long, with beautiful aurora australis was observed from the deck of this ship. In the words of the officer of the watch, who observed it, "a faint appearance, it" extended from southeast to southwest, with an height about 30 degrees, and from what I could see light, sending up rays of a paler red, until gradually the whole heavens were veiled in a cloud of fiery crimson, which continued for the remainder of the watch." The weather at the time was equally, with occasional showers of rain; had a atmosphere hazy; thermometer in air, 87°; bottometer, 79·50 inches, and rising; attd. thermometer, 72°. This is the only occasion on which we saw this beautiful phenomenon. At the watch, you will see from the log, it occurred seven nights. Was the electricity, if such it is, first gendered or evolved at the southern pole, to be drawn toward the north, and up at the zenith? one? You do not give the date upon which it was first seen at the north, but I think it must have appeared first to us. If the apparently two phenomena were really but one, how long did it take for the electricity to pass from the southern position to Quebec—a distance of ny 6000 miles? It was a year to us from the watch of 1st, September 2; when did they first see it in Quebec?

S.

THE LOUNGER.

ITINERANTS.

IT is a capital story which is told of Dr. Johnson's pronounds through Billingsgate, where he was once insulted by a woman, "Woman, you are a rascal!" "Woman, you are a nouns adjective!" "Woman, you are a pronoun substantive!" "Heavens! woman, you are a mere interjection, or even adverb."

Such pugs was never known in Billingsgate before, and the lexicographer had new illustrations of the power of words at his command.

The story is told afresh very often and very amusingly. Thus the Lyceum or lecture system, which is now one of the institutions of the country, apparently produces profound pain in the minds of many observers. The whole system is scathed by calling the lecturers hard names. They are "superficial," "crude," "indigested," "unsafe," "sensational," "pretentious," "shallow," "meretricious," "dangerous," and "infidel" people; and above all, they are strangers. The population which the lecturers inspire does not fully relieve itself until it has called them perpetrators of "humbugs" and "frauds," and "professional bids ware"— Can the imagination figure any more comprehensive epithet?

Well, there is no escaping it. They do "peddle their wares." Nobody else does, of course. Editors don't, who have columns to fill with their copy. Clergymen don't, who are regularly paid for expounding their views and doctrines. Authors don't, who have boxes of tea and bales of cotton. Lawyers don't, who sell opinions and pleas. None of these respectable people do their work. They supply a supernatural demand.

Then the lecturers are itinerants. They do travel from place to place. Nobody else does, of course. Bishops are not itinerants, nevertheless journeying from place to place. Lawyers are not, traveling the circuit. Clergymen are not, accepting calls and leaving when a richer church wishes to hear them. It is only your genuine Lyceum lecturer who is an itinerant peddler of his wares.

Itinerant, gentle Sir or Madame, means travel-ers. When the Great Teacher gave to his disciples "Go ye into all lands and preach the Gospel," he instituted itinerancy. When Ignatius Loyola instituted itinerancy, founded the Order of Jesuits, he did not forget the wisdom that had provided for the dissemination of the truth; and when John Wesley made his Methodist dissent, he organically established itinerancy. Read Mr. Milburn's book, if you want to know what itinerants of that kind are. So the English Church, in its system of Episcopal visitation, adopts another form of itinerancy; which is supported by the union of Christian sects in the missionary system to the heathen.

Let us all hope, therefore, that to be an itinerant is not necessarily to be an atheist nor a pickpocket. Let us hope that if a man has said a good or wise word in New York, he is not altogether an incendiary, a knave, and idiot, if he accepts an invitation to go to Boston or Philadelphia—to Chicago or to Lawrence—to repeat it, and be paid for his breath and labor. Why, after all, an editor who says something worth saying in his morning paper in New York (and it always is worth saying, because it is always true, and good-tempered, and humane; entirely free from personal or political bitterness, and in the least superficial, crude, speculative, or shallow)—when an editor does this he tells the saying to every hearer in Iowa and New England who chooses to buy, at the rate of three or four cents a hearer. The difference between him and a lecturer is, that he pulls his wares without seeing his customers or the country they live in.

It ought to be a great comfort to such a stay-at-home itinerant—a kind of paralyzed peripatetic—to say, "Those whom I instruct, stay at home and stay at home—that the Lyceum has been grafted on my work. They are my disciples every year, until there are left mainly the speakers who are sure to co-operate with the aforesaid stay-at-home peripatetics in the great cause of human justice and of divine truth, which are so precious to them. Surely it ought to be cause of pride, giving to the peddlers who sell their wares at home, and for their own advantage, oh no! but for the good of their fellow-men—that these people abroad are equally interested in benefiting their fellow-creatures. Many a man's living, both the stationary and traveling preachers teach the unessential truth, so it is with the newspaper and the lecturer, the author and the lecturer. The great Public is the customer of both. The people have been taught the worth of each; and if they give light, short weight, that heart will not ask whether he were itinerant or staid at home. It is priests that will be bankrupt in the respect and confidence of good men.

PALMER'S WHITE CAPTIVE.

No: it is not she, it is he who are captive Faithful, heroic, womanly character conquers in the end, and all the conquers so constantly in life. With womanly pride, half-turned—modesty, not shame—with womanly dignity, with perplexed, appealing, pathetic, incredulous eyes, and none to hope in human hands, but stands victorious in spirit, Palmer's figure of power.

This noble work of Palmer's is full of positive not negative beauty—of character. It is not a frightened fawn; it is not a woman helpless in her fate, and superior while suffering,—The womanly soul can neither be entrapt nor slain, whatever chances, and the figure shows it. The suffering, the pain, the perplexity, are all in the expression. But the soul, serenely regnant, plants the body in virgin repose, while it scans through the troubles it yet has power to change. What victory is the firm figure! What superb disdain in the shaped hand behind!

This statue is an entirely, characteristically modern work. The inspiration of Greek sculpture is ideal beauty. It is not individual, but symbolical. It is not even an individual treated as a representative of a class or of individuality, and tries to express abstract combination and perfection of qualities. But art, following the development of the Christian principle both in religion and society, finds the individual the type of the ideal. The Greek spirit is unto the least of these my little ones doeth it unto me." So this single nameless woman, borne off captive in some wild Indian raid on the frontier Wyoming valley, touches individual sympathy, and, like every individual work, has also the power and the human dignity of all women.

Page's Venus—to poetic, to lovely—is a work of the most modern, classic, historic art; and as we said that it had no sign of any date later than a three centuries ago. It is not a woman, but a goddess; an ideal embodiment of womanliness. The White Captive is an individual woman, with an individual story; not ideally perfect, but individually and characteristically beautiful. The figure has a womanly mask, not a classic abstract expression—it is sensitive with feeling. The hair is not ideally parted. Look at it: it is not evenly balanced from the middle.

Is it a fact of no meaning that neither the paintings of Leutze nor of Mr. Ames nor the sculptor of the White Captive have ever been over the sea to study classic art?

IN RE SOLDIERS.

Two books of two heroes, one very famous, the other little known, have lately been published, and as both richly deserve it, one is a life and the other an epistle: the Life of General Jackson, by James Parton, whose Life of Burr is, doubtless, the most successful biography ever published in this country; and Twelve Years of a Soldier's Life in India.

Now a mere soldier is not a very high type of man. He is a good man whom the higher attributes reinforce the lower. Foresight, calmness, intellectual superiority, and power state themselves to make the animal qualities available. A good soldier is a gun multiplied by human intelligence and moral force. Strategic genius is the skillful application of intellectual power to the most absolute physical coercion of men. It may operate by means of moral impressions, as where a line of battle is no displayed or fortifications are so constructed that the enemy is conquered before a blow is struck or a life lost. But the end is the same. The result is not wrought by reason. It is the victory of a cat over a mouse. It is not a victory like that of Columbus, or Galileo, or Jenner.

This conviction is the secret of our popular satisfaction with Washington. His military success was episodical. He was not a soldier, merely or essentially. His soldiering, in fact, does not seem to have been so much a special military endowment as the application of ordinary good sense to war; which is not always true of great soldiers or fighters. It certainly was not of Nelson, nor of Wellington. Nor was it of Alexander the Great, or Hannibal, or Napoleon. For the empires of these men were only permanent camps. They appeared always at the head of troops in the insignia of Generals. Their civic administrations were merely the arts of military principles.

Hence none of them lasted. And Rome did not last. And Napoleon ever will, where a military chief or class becomes absolute ruler. For the principle of human progression must always be the intellectual subjection of the lower traits to the higher, and not the assistance of them by the higher.

TWO HEROES.

THE preceding thoughts are suggested by the life of any military man however disinterested and able. Among such in our later history as one was more conspicuous or received a greater popularity than Andrew Jackson. Upon the character and claims of no man in our history were opinions more diversely divided than upon his. He was either a brute, a madman, and a fool, or he was gifted with the most profound political sagacity and industrious energy. If a man believed in the United States Bank, General Jackson was a villain and a despot. If he were opposed to a bank, Jackson was a statesman and patriot.

The din and dust of the great Jackson debate have gradually passed away in the discussion of graver questions. But the truth is that a remarkable figure of our history is hardly less fresh in the mists of the past than it was, when for the first volume is issued, bringing the memoir down to the year 1824, just before the battle of New Orleans, is the more valuable because so much men have not been altogether fortunate in their biographical representations. Still living is there was no very satisfactory life of Washington. There is not now any Marshall. Mr. Parton writes the story of Jefferson with almost too much fervor. Mr. Rives's "Madison" does not serve the purpose. Mr. Sparks's Life and Works of his grandfather is invaluable as a repository of revolutionary and early political lore, but it is a cyclopedia.

If we may judge from the first large, fair volume of the "Life of Andrew Jackson," Mr. Parton is doing his work with an impartiality, completeness, fidelity, and fascination of narration, which will make it the standard work of the intelligent reader and satisfactory to the political student. The subject is full of romantic and picturesque incident. The author's treatment of it is adapted to set to the material skillfully, yet with perfect honesty, without inventing nor coloring. He has not made up his mind in advance that Jackson was a hero, and so gives a heroic aspect to every thing he did or did. But he tells the evidence before us, carefully sifted, justly relying upon the intrinsic value of the facts, and leaves every reader to judge for himself. This candor is a rare charm in biographical treatment. The principle is simply moral honesty. It is only to be that, if a man's life is worth writing at all, it is because the man was deserving of writing about.

The story of Jackson's childhood and early border life is lawyering in Tennessee; his marriage; his Dickinson duel; his "Hero" to the Creek war; and the march into Florida and Louisiana, is the substance of the first volume. The narration is flowing and charming. We confess that we read the whole in two prolonged sittings. The image left upon the mind is that of a strong, irascible, willful man; born for the border; aggressive, unbalanced; his impulses sometimes with prudence; ignorant, but of strong good sense; all of these qualities making him an admirable partisan, Indian soldier, but without that personal magnetism which we call geniality; and thus far in the story we see evidence of no higher quality than executive, not yet of political administrative, talent.

As he advances, Mr. Parton will tread more dangerous and delicate ground, but there need be no fear that he will fail.

The other work is a collection of letters written by Major Malcolm, of English descent, chiefly during the Sikh and Sepoy wars. Major Hodson was the man who captured the King of Delhi, and who shot his sons before his face. He was brave. He was a Reggby boy, and an Oxonian; and as a soldier he was certainly an ever fought. He fights and dashes across the field like a Paladin, like a Murat; the very incarnation of British pluck. Faithful, generous, affectionate, fearless, he states are by far the best history of the war, and a living picture of the best kind of English soldier. They also show the miserable military system of England, which would have inevitably lost India, except for the individual valor of the Englishmen, who had to fight not only with the Sepoys but with the grandees of their own army.

Mr. Hughes in an introduction, and the Reverend brother of Major Hodson, who edits the book, speak in a good deal of the Christian character. Now that a man is not necessarily inhuman because he is a soldier is true, but that because he is a brave man, thwacking and hacking and shooting right and left, for the honor of England and the supremacy of British arms, he is a generous fellow, also, that he is therefore a "Christian" soldier, does not so plainly appear. He is a civilized man, instead of a barbarian, fighting. But he tries just as hard as the barbarian to slay and dissolve. What is the "Christian" part of the killing and wounding?

THE LOUNGER'S LETTER-BOX.

—A Fanatic. In Spanish the word Quixote is pronounced Kosheety. In English it is pronounced as it is spelled.

—The name "Mrs. Grundy" is taken from a farce in which Elston used to play, and in which there is the same common reference to her opinion which is observed in another farce in which we all play.

THE AMERICAN MINISTER STARTING FOR PEKIN.—[FROM A SKETCH BY OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.]

MR. WARD AT PEKIN.

[FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.]

PEKIN, July 23, 1859.

A MONTH since, while anchored off the Pei-ho River, in the Powhatan, I sent you an illustrated account of the battle of the Pei-ho. At that time we saw no prospect of either us or the English reaching this city, but fortune favored "the star-spangled banner," and smiles upon us now as we "live and move and have our being" in the great capital of the great empire of the world. We arrived yesterday; and I am now writing this letter from our comfortable quarters in the eastern section of "the old city," knowing that it will be one of the few accounts ever cast upon the sea of Western literature from this secluded and seldom visited centre of Chinese power. It is something unusual to be able to say, "I am writing a letter from Pekin," and should the reader be disappointed, as the writer has been, he must take this fact into consideration. I am simply anxious to show what we ourselves have seen—to show Pekin as it really is, so far as our limited means for observation enable me to.

Ours is the third party speaking English that has ever visited this place. In 1793 an English embassy, headed by Lord Macartney, the Governor-General of India, was received; and in 1816 a second, in charge of Lord Amherst, followed. Now, in 1859, comes an American embassy, headed by the Hon. John E. Ward, of Georgia.

The morning of the 20th instant saw us land at Pei-tang, where we were received with all honor by our escort, and where we saw thirty covered carts for our individual transportation, and about half the number of wagons for that of our baggage. Though having just breakfasted before leaving the Toey-wan,* we were now confronted into a comfortable and airy room, where refreshments in the shape of tea and cakes were pressed upon us, and where we asked questions relating to our journey while the baggage was being transferred to the wagons. We started finally at 7.20 A.M.; cool weather, overcast sky, and a strong breeze blowing from the southeast. Had it not been for this overcast weather I do not know what we should have done in the strong and well-built, but miserably uncomfortable covered carts, drawn by two mules, and insanely termed "chariots," through some unnatural distortion of Chinese perception. Before getting into "chariot No. 10," which had been especially designated as the one to do the jolting for my particular self, I stopped to admire (?) it. And I want the reader to do the same thing now. Here it stands, body, wheels, the number on the shaft in both Chinese and English, shafts, mules, and thin celestial driver, en masse. Being of such uncomfortably simple construction, the artist has been able to produce a most truthful sketch.

* The Powhatan, drawing too much water, had been left at anchor, ten or twelve miles away, the day before, and we had come in in the chartered steamer.

Now the reader will observe that this "chariot," though unquestionably classical in this respect, is entirely innocent of springs. He will further observe that the iron perimeters of the wheels are roughed with the heads of iron spikes, and that altogether it has a look suggestive of violent jolts, exclamations of pain, and unavailing efforts to protect one's bones by "holding on." Especially is this the case when one finds himself in company with such a vehicle at the wrong end of a very rough road, forty-five miles long, about as many broad, and from one to two feet deep. In short, when he sees an indefinite plain of mud extending out before him, over which he is to drive in search of the smoothest and most solid footing. I looked at this vehicle, reader, as you are now looking at it, and, in the words of the modern novelist, "looking I shuddered." I "shuddered" at its polished frame of hard and unyielding oak, at its cushionless and mattressless bottom, at the right-angles and sharp corners of the interior, and at its generally solid and unspringy tout ensemble. Satisfied upon all of these points, I stopped "shuddering," and rubbed my own angles and corners, and wondered how black and blue they would all be the next morning. I don't know how long I might have looked at it in this way had I not been observed by my friend the Captain of Marines, with the accompanying exclamation:

"Come, No. 10, tumble in, and let No. 11 drive up!"

So I "tumbled in," and No. 11 drove up and received my suggestive friend, who did not seem more ready to "tumble in" than I had been. He was assisted in turn, however, by No. 12, who was subsequently indebted to No. 13 for a similar service; and so on down the entire line. The reader will observe that, like a certain class of society who are indebted to governments for shelter, food, raiment, and employment, we were dropping our names, and becoming known by our numbers. And indeed, from present appearances, we are living treated much more like favored prisoners than honored guests, as it is now nearly forty-eight hours since we have been confined to our walled residence. But to return to my narrative.

Fortunately some of us had ridden in these "chariots" before, and though taking it for granted that they would be well cushioned for so long a journey, we had nevertheless provided ourselves with pillows, blankets, etc., lest said cushions should prove thin. And now, as I look back to that ride, I feel confident that those articles stood between me and a violent death by jolting, and I shall always hereafter entertain a profound respect for blankets, pillows, and pea-jackets.

As the reader can see no door to this vehicle, he may perhaps be curious as to the mode of entering it. This was accomplished by an exercise of agility, which seated one upon the shaft, just over the number, with his legs hanging down, and with his back toward that of the chariot. Then said legs had to be lifted up until parallel with the shafts, thus producing a right-angle triangle with our bodies. Then using the point thus created as a pivot, we had to twist, and squirm, and lift ourselves from the floor by both hands, and strike our heads against the low roof, and resort to a great many other contortions of the body, while navigating backward to the friendly pillows. Of course most of these feats had to be gone over again when we got out; and this fact tended, in a great measure, to induce us to remain inside. After we had thus backed into our holes, our respective charioteers became agile in turn, ensconced themselves upon two-thirds of the front, and thus most effectually kept out all pure air, as well as two-thirds of the view. The Chinese, as a nation, are not remarkable for cleanliness of either person or habits, and experience has lately shown us that Chinese charioteers are not superior to the mass of their countrymen in this respect. The particular gentleman who had "No. 10" marked upon his vehicle was any thing but a pleasant neighbor. That delicate vegetable known to the Romans under the family name of "allium," and to market-women of the present day as "garlic," evidently answered largely into the composition of his food, and, indeed, constituted his entire diet, could one judge from the nature of the atmosphere which constantly surrounded him. The bowl of a very ancient pipe, projecting from the waist of his dark-colored trowsers, added variety to the prevailing scent, and, with said trowsers, constituted his attire. As regarded cold water in connection with his appearance, perhaps possibly he might have been kicked from his seat into a mud-puddle many years back, when first learning to drive, but he had certainly since that period conceived an insurmountable repugnance to every thing resembling that fluid. I think if I now had it in my power to repay him for all the unnecessary jolting to which he subjected me—through a chronic habit of falling asleep—I should put him daily under a shower of the most pure Croton. As it is, I am a Mexican dollar and a vast amount of pantomimic conversation out of pocket—money and gesticulation vainly expended in the hope of creating a feeling of gratitude which should keep him awake and steer "the chariot" over the smoothest roads.

THE VOYAGE ON THE RIVER.—[FROM A SKETCH BY OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.]

SPECIMEN OF CHINESE COUNTRY CARTS.—[FROM A SKETCH BY OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.]

And thus we started. Thirty or forty chariots in a string, dozens of mandarins capering up and down the line upon their ungroomed horses, baggage wagons bringing up the rear, and every other "leader" kicking up and facing in the opposite direction instead of going ahead. Charioteers using their long whips freely, victims being thrown up, down, backward, forward, to the right, and to the left; mud and muddy water flying, and the wind blowing half a gale. "Go it while you are young!" Were we not coming to Pekin?

As we were thus jolted out of Pei-tsang we looked ahead as far as the eye could reach in a northwesterly direction, and saw nothing but one extended plain of mud, profusely sprinkled with pools of rain-water and conical piles of whitened mud. There was not even a blade of grass springing from this extensive and level surface of blue mud, nor could the strongest eye reach a tree or house between us and the distant horizon. It was all mud, nothing but blue mud, excepting in the case of "the whitened piles," which had themselves originally been blue, but which were then bleached by the wind and sun.

Four hours passed heavily enough, and brought us in sight of the village of Kenn-Laung, where we were to dine and remain overnight to await the arrival of the more heavily ladened baggage wagons.

Arrived within hail of the stone entrance to the outer court of one of the houses of the village, where the chief mandarins of our escort were awaiting to chin-chin us at the moment of our arrival, we floundered through a heavy slough that covered the holes, and ended the journey by pulling up with a jerk upon the first dry pieces of ground that we had passed for some time. It seemed that "our escort" had taken care to retain for themselves the fastest teams, and thus was one or more of them always enabled to be in advance and present us familiar faces upon our arrival at the different stopping-places. In other words, some of them always acted the part of the "avant-courier"—clearing the track, and seeing that things generally were properly cared for.

MR. WARD AND HIS SUITE AT THE GATE OF PEKIN.—[FROM A SKETCH BY OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.]

With pain of limb, but pleasure of mind, we exerted ourselves and stood upon the dry ground. Of course the next thing to be done was to "shake ourselves," after which we returned the chin-chining of our escort, and passed through a long-flagged passage-way, leading to a roomy wooden house that had been prepared for us. This passage-way carried us through a door of solid wooden planks into a square court-yard, around which the house was built in the shape of a quadrangle, and overhead, which served as the awning-covering, was tented a mat awning which kept out the sun perfectly without in the least interfering with the ventilation. Under the cool shade of this elevated awning we found several tables covered with iced water-melons, and surrounded by attendants, under or still-backed arm-chairs, it is true, but finely made, and highly polished, and very comfortable, and looking as if they might last a hundred years. Opening into this court were several short hastily into cleanly-swept rooms, since the halves of which were occupied by raised platforms upon which were spread sparkling clean—looking mats, the first egress our bedding upon these, and then, against the advice of the surgeon, but following the lead of his assistant, marched gallantly—for the attack of the iced melons.

"What have you all digged your bath for?" queried a voice. "We can't be going to stay here all night! It's not worth it!"

"Of course we are!" replied a bruised one; "do you suppose we have not had jolting enough for one day?"

And so we remained at Koun-Leang-Ching until the next morning.

Koun-Leang-Ching, when translated into a decent language, reads, "The depôt where provisions are stored for the Army," but I could not learn that there were any then on hand, or indeed that there were any provisions in which to store them when there were. Its dwellings were built of a mixture of mud and straw, some of them boasting stone or brick foundations, and all having a mean and cool and excessively filthy. A vermin-covered population—second in its century—of perhaps two thousand manages to witness the decay of a half-ruined temple to Buddha.

Between the iced melons and dinner several of us took a walk through some of the more pretending streets. In no one of the "it was bounsand" in the shape of half-clothed men, nude boys, and in the distance, barrickade-looking objects that were said to be cannon. Not a splendid sight to the well-formed, graceful, and well-dressed woman! What a beautiful sight it was to the unsophisticated! with her white cap, outspread Bible, and gold spectacles moistened by the Christian's tear! But how revolting it was to man who has come to look upon man in both moral and physical deformity; a life-long stranger to cold water, and a piece of soap which must be carefully watched by its owner to guard against deception. Add a large bag of rags to this picture, and the woman of China—and Koun-Leang-Ching—stands before us.

Having spoken of what we did see, I must now tell the reader what we did not see. We did not see at Koun-Leang a single scowling or, indeed, unpleasant face. And when this statement is made, I feel well observe that all the people through whom we have since passed have looked upon us precisely as I once saw the country people of my own State look upon a very small pony mounted by a very large monkey, or, in other words, they looked upon us as New Yorkers once upon a time crowded to see Barnum's "Rocky Mountain Goats." My feeling exhibited but that of intense curiosity, which might have proved good-will, or, again, innate hostility. As for the inhabitants, they are the most cool ed every means to add to our comfort and to render us respect. As they wish to make a favorable "first" ward, and get him between them and the English?

Recalled from our walk by the signal for dinner, we returned to find ourselves comfortably seated at square tables covered by small towels, saucers, and plates, upon which were piled several dozen of every of fruits of seventeen different kinds, but among which was to be seen nothing in the shape of meat or vegetables. This was rather chilling to the appetite of men who had travelled several hours back upon food rendered unpalatable, but was consigned to the arrival of at least seventeen other bowls, saucers, and plates of "the substantial." Every delicacy known to the Chinese gourmand, and it is an even separate vessel, steamed before us, and "chopsticks" were placed by the two-pronged ivory forks to tempt us to feats of daring. I wish it understood that I am the only one who can, even after long practice, handle these instruments without endangering the purity of white trousers, and this I advance as a reason for my having ordained the slim fork with my left thumb and forefinger.

While we were thus amusing ourselves, a mandarin, wearing an opaque white ball upon the top of his cool straw-hat, approached us with the usual "chin-chin," and gave us to understand by signs that it would please him to see us eating faster.

"John," I replied, "if we are doing our best, old luck. You must know that there is a limit to the capacity of the Anglo-Saxon stomach, and if you not conceal more than a gallon each, and there are several more gallons here than there are rooms."

Now, as this was all spoken in English, it is probable that he did not comprehend perfectly; but he nevertheless replied. And he replied by striking his left palm with his right fist and ejaculating emphatically, "Kil-oh-kew!" after which he pointed to a particular dish and said, "How! how!" which we subsequently learned was expressive of "Good! good!" in the mandarin dialect.

"That's his name!" exclaimed one of the party.

"Maybe it's the name of the dish," suggested a second, as he assailed it with fork and fingers.

"Why, it is beef!" he exclaimed after tasting it. "Who would have recognized it?"

"Kil-oh-kew!" repeated our friend, making a second dive into the left palm and then chin-chining violently. He had, evidently, discovered that its nature was known, and was circumcomprehended the meaning of the exclamation, "Kil-oh-kew!" They had killed an ox for our express benefit, and that was the nearest he could approach the pronunciation.

"Kil-oh-kew!" and his "Kill-o-kew!" suggested the explorer into the unknown dish. And Kil-oh-kew it was! The very pleasant mandarin officials have learned the joke, appreciate it, and speak of him as "Kil-oh-kew." And I will add here that I have very pleasant feelings in the previous to making our acquaintance he was known to his friends as "Kil-oh-kew," and during the journey came quite in keeping with his vivacity of disposition. He made himself quite agreeable during the journey, but his chief duties were of a nature that indeed we have not seen a single member of our escort make our acquaintance. We have made ourselves by getting off the familiar expression at irregular intervals, and striking his left palm with a force which would result in a broken wrist if he struck with he would point to some object and exclaim, "Name?" and in this way he picked up a good many words. Kill-o-kew also gave many evidences of being a wag—a Chinese wag. He was to be known by the twinkle of his left eye, by his jovial and swaggering air, by the manner in which he created fun at the expense of the "outside barbarians," and by the matter-of-course air with which this fun was received by his superiors in authority.

That night we slept very well at Koun-Leang, but got up at daylight with very sore bones. We had accomplished fifty miles over the hilly country, and were now met by a light breakfast and the information that we had thirty miles (or ninety li) before us for the second day's ride. Our only tough old chaplain, who weighs perhaps two hundred and fifty pounds, and who has been carefully protected by his natural pillows from the jolting of the first fifteen miles, now looked grave and rubbed his "natural pillows" with an ominous hand.

"Do you think you can see no safely through the day?" he inquired very wistfully. But the chaplain's eyes looked upon him with malignant gaze, and, for the first time in my life, I experienced a desire to see a missionary made more than usually sore and thirty-eight. Breakfast over, we again started.

Our road was a succession of mountain-passes, all of which began to be suddenly and profusely sprinkled with towns, villages, trees, fields, and gardens. So we thought at the time, and supposed, here, however, to be seen, each farmer's lot seeming to be separated and surrounded generally by a simple ridge of raised earth—in one sense more than a foot in height. Cattle were also seen browsing upon the native and thick grass of the mountain-sides and tracts, and we wondered that they did not cross the low ridges and trample down the crops which they stood. Certainly the fact of their fore and hind, legs, on one side, being hobbled together could not be considered a reason why they should not, if they received their education." The day before we had seen no cattle at all upon the hills, and at the same time, we counted no less than ten settlements in a day.

The talk had seemed to have ended at Koun-Leang, and the one hope entertained was that the extensive cultivation of China began to unfold itself. We were now to see the thickly-settled towns and villages during that ride of thirty miles, boasting of a conquered population of a million.

Our road often passed through these settlements, and at 2.30 A.M. we halted in one of the larger ones for the purpose of breakfast.

The name of this place was Si-Ti-To or Western Back Head; and it was there that we first saw women and little girls tolerably unveiled among the crowds that gathered to see us. It may be well to remark that the "Western Barbarians" were mostly "bearded like the Pard," whereas those of China have no hair at all about the face. Sometimes you see a mustache, but rarely; the hair, including hairs under the ears; but the Chinese as a barbarous race, and as the only race in the barbarian lists of most Eastern races, I believe—hence one of their sources of pride—that, though we now many "the fair sex" at Si-Ti-To, we have not seen precisely those of Koun-Leang that I shall say no more about them. The village was surrounded by the first females who had approached us within reach of a sculptor's chisel. We took very good care to keep them at that distance, for, indeed, I think their distance was necessary to lend enchantment to the view.

Having devoted an hour to breakfast, we resumed our journey, and continued on the journey. At times we passed through long avenues of people, and at "cross-roads" they collected in groups, and stood upon tiptoe to see us with childish curiosity. Villages gave forth their entire population, and hundreds, with great gravity, put their hoes and farm-tools to get a closer view of "The Barbarians" who were going to see the Emperor." Mothers held their children in their arms, and pointed the hands out those in front, and fathers led little daughters by either hand to guard them in case of sudden pressure.

Among other things which I saw to admire, during the day, were the "Chinese Wheelbarrow" and the "Chinese Sedan."

Any jolly Yankee wheelbarrow might be repaired

* Most of their dishes were in the shape of stews, indeed, almost as thin as soups, and many were made up of a dozen different things. It was often quite impossible to say what they were, so undetermined was their general appearance. In consequence of this, several of our party confined themselves to candied fruits, some of which were superior to any thing of the kind that we can boast. Others, again, found "the substantials" quite inviting. I don't think I ever relished any thing more than a stew of shanks' feet, hicks-de-mer, or trigang, mushrooms, etc. What gathered in this way, the shanks' feet resemble gelatine both in taste and appearance.

by the farmer himself with rough tools and without application to a wheel-wright. The wagons in Yorick, or rather on which, our baggage was transported were not unlike these—"sit-pour" being at hand to protect their bush in case of a shower.

At 11 P.M. we had accomplished three-fourths of our journey, and arrived within five miles of the then town of Machi-tang, Pei-tang, and Sitang, situated upon the banks of the Pei-ho River, twelve miles above Tein-tsing, and terminating our chief journey. Before reaching Machi-tang, however, we were destined to a parting benefit of lighting, at the conclusion of which the surgeon remarked, emphatically, that a man not only runs the risk of breaking an arm, but also of having his head broken. This was probably owing to the fact that the road was yet to come—that between the end of our river navigation and Peking. As already observed, we could see Machi-tang ahead, and even the masts of the junks which were to convey us to the mouth of the Pei-ho River; but we could also see miles of axle-deep mud, which here and there with pools of water, and painful experience had told us we were upon what was "the bottom" under such a surface. We were therefore prepared for a "spill," and were under no nothing over which we might stumble. We braced ourselves against the sides, entered the low with a crack of the whip of "Ta! ha! ta!" at the leader, plowed through a few yards of it, and—landed.

Reader, were you ever stuck in a bog—in a Chinese bog? If you have never been, I would not advise you to come to China for the sake of it; but—or rather how it smells. I took advantage of the momentary pause to light a cigar and make the following note:

"Time, 1 P.M. Fast in a slough—extent undetermined. Other chariots equally stuck. Town in the distance. Various 'leaders' bawling in the wrong direction. Coolies in requisition, and prospects generally dismal. Retire behind a cigar."

"Come, John! This will not do, my unwashed friend! Look to the leader another touch."

Now I do not suppose that "John" comprehended me exactly, but he evidently opened a communication with the after-extremity of the animal indicated, causing him to kick very high several times, and then, after a relatively severe kick, threw himself forward, however, by the whip of charioteer. The mud flew, the chariot lurched, and made every thing snap, and jerked the cart bodily from a new object which was perhaps smaller than a four bushel.

Reader, you have not again with a Chinese bog. In the first place, my mouth and eyes were peppered, and with such force as to have disqualified me for kicking up. In the second place, my head and left arm were nearly broken by the bound of the chariot. And, thirdly, we were thrown without limit during the several minutes required to settle us into a wide, deep, and very unpleasant mud-hole like a jelly. I came out of that slough with an ambition that expired to even greater things than to comfortable. I intend to own a pair of Chinese vehicle profusely cushioned with sir-bags, should I ever be favored by a return to that out of China. But the most enraged individual of the party was our usually mild and amiable chaplain.

"What's the matter, Mr. Chaplain, Mr.?" asked the Minister, as he loomed over the side of the junk.

"Sir, I do not know how to reply! It is barbarous to subject poor mortals to such treatments as this. Sir, I am exhausted, Sir. I am—I am as an ample cause for war. I could whip any Chinese Emperors between this and Pekin, Sir. Ough! Oh my!"

Nature's pulleys" had evidently failed the old gentleman in the hour of need.

Upon reaching Ma-chi-tang, and learning that we were twelve miles (by the river) above Tein-tsing, we repaired on board of the junks in an pleasant humor.

The following night we did a very respectable amount of sleeping on board of our four junks, and at 5 A.M. we commenced our journey down the river. It was the signal calling all hands to get under way. Altogether, our party and escort required about fifteen hundred boats, and a crew of over a hundred trackers and sailors to get them up the river. The whole scene of confusion attending the moving of so large a Chinese party can scarcely be imagined. The reader may have been shown by the police and hotels at home; and he may see playthings in comparison with these—twenty-five hundred boats, each of which was about a diameter, belabored by twenty-six arms long used to extracting the greatest possible amount of noise; and every boat, also, aided the shouts (or rather shouts) of two hundred men, the falling of poles, and the tossing of every other day of the three towns, it amounted to distraction. We have since learned that much of the gong belaboring was owing to the fact that each grand people, and therefore advise any other "grand people" contemplating a visit to China to do likewise.

There is no tide as high up as Ma-chi-tang, the current always running toward the sea, with a more velocity at night than in the hour; it was consequently all up-hill work for the trackers, though the river was sufficiently wide to allow that which the boatman always spread our single sails. These "sprays" are a singular class, and follow a life which must be a terrible tax upon the constitution. I have seen them wading through waist-deep mud for hours at a time, and then, at a single bound, down in their wet clothes (when they boasted any) to another simple meal of boiled millet and salt fish, after which they would stretch back on the hot tracking line and plunges through more mud and water. We could not but pity them, and took care that they had a dollar each at the end of the trip, in addition to their "thirty cents per day and food" which they received from the Government. Owning, possibly, to the life being such a trying one, the demand for their services often exceeds the supply, and in such cases (when the Government is not absent) any and every one is forced into the traces until the desired number is obtained. It was our fortune to witness more than one of these scenes of impressment. We had but thirteen of them during the previous night by desertion, and as the river was growing more rapid as we ascended it, it became necessary not only to fill their places, but to add still further to the number. When we were about to start again after their dinner, therefore, several disguised policemen mixed among the curious crowd that we had, as usual, assembled on the bank, and at a preconcerted signal pounced down upon their victims. How many hooks. You never saw such a sudden and general stillness as that which ensued—not even at the turning-point of a "spill." The trackers were hawling upon the upon the decks of the junks, looking about for excitement and noise, could not imagine why the entire crowd took so suddenly to their heels, whether to run to their villages as if for dear life; but we were soon enlightened by seeing a dozen or more unoffending, built countrymen led passively up to the line and "hooked on."

If the reader will examine the construction of these junks he will readily see how comfortable we could quarter so large a number, and indeed we had nothing to complain of. We had both bedrooms and a saloon, our own bed and table furniture, and our own cooks and boys. Then our cabin was a model of darkness, whose sole business it was to furnish the expedition with provisions, supplied and cooked with every delicacy along the route—clear ice and tender spring-chickens not excepted—and the same attentions are being kept up by the servants.

For all these supplies they offer no payment; but we have reason to believe that they receive no pay-ing at the end of the trip, or as soon as the trusties is exchanged.

Traveling only by daylight, we occupied five days in accomplishing the one hundred and thirty miles between Ma-chi-tang and Tein-tsing; but the quiet of that five days was a glorious contrast with our "jolting" sufferings. We literally turned our backs upon every thing like a disturbance. We found the river very winding, often tracking for several hours due west or to that southeast, and for a narrow neck of land from our starting-point—perhaps a mile—we reached after hours of labor.

I suppose we must have passed at least a hundred towns and villages between Ma-chi-Tsang and Tein-tsing, but most of the inhabitants of which, of course, lined the banks to admire (?) us as we passed. The same occasions we noticed that all of the lower orders were dressed in suits of brown and blue sack-jackets, while merchants and others were very tastefully clad in silks and satins—each reaching nearly to the ankle. The dress of the boatmen was generally of silk or brown grass cloth, and those of children were of gorgeous pieces provided by nature. Many of the women had their heads fancifully dressed, and their hair, which I thought—decorated with flowers, and some of the young girls and children were dressed in flowing trousers of pink cotton and white petticoats, the latter articles resembling a morning wrapper cut off below the hips. This costume, I noticed, was worn by the little creatures set pleasantly with the everlasting blue and white, evidently much soiled, of the manner. Nine out of ten of the children that came under our observation were victims to the miserable custom of cramping the feet during young. The pain it produced the hearts of the first father and mother when they could have endured any thing rather than the helpless little girls? The custom must have had "a beginning."

There was another remarkable Chinese custom —they have so many curious customs—which attracter of the party unfortunately—myself, and which looked a little serious at first. It seems that they always turn incense to their god, Joh, over the bow of their boats, and hence that part is considered sacred; they will not even expectorate over it, for fear of offending the deity. Imagine, therefore, their surprise and horror to see a barbarian stuse it in the most (to the Chinese mind) irreverent and sacrilegious manner. The pipe was often lifted up his hands, rolled his eyes, raised a most fearful ejaculatory, and danced on the prefixed spot as if possessed by a thousand devils. The whole crew became almost alarmed—and stopped their work, as if expecting retribution direct from their insulted god. Our offending friend gazed in ignorant wonder at his demonstrations of tendons storm, saw that some act of his must have raised it, and exhorted harder than ever. The Minister took interpreter, attended by the captain's nephew and by the confused sound of many voices, hastened to the spot, fearful of some awful curse or visit, and hurriedly inquired as to the cause.

"He has profaned the abode of Joh! The best will be avenged in the form of a fever! He shall all perish!" exclaimed the old man, during a pause in his dance.

With happy judgment and tact an interpreter saw through the difficulty, and sympathized with the horrified crew, and said, "Joh is a fool! He said, in conclusion, 'here! take four dollars, and buy a pig and a fowl and incense and a joss for your god!' The dance at once ceased, the old captain smiled, the boatmen laughed, and an unlimited amount of paper was immediately procured, and then the pronounced appeased, and things resumed their ordinary course.

We had an adventure with the populace which reminds of the riflemen. We were passing a large town, and, as usual, the banks as well as the junks between us and them were densely crowded. There was a party of negro-glisten on board, with the use of which one of our boatmen—poetically dubbed "Cockey"—had become familiar. This fellow seeing one of us looking at the crowd through one of them, exclaimed, in an alarmed voice, "Look out! they'll shoot you!" At which a general stampede came off, during which more than one unfortunate must have been assimilated to a pancake. Fortunately, one of the interpreters was on deck at the moment, who incontinently pitched into Master Cockey's upon the spot, and this, combined with the excessive merriment of a small son of the captain, notified them of the sell" to which they had been subjected. Whereupon they laughed, pancakes and all, and again crowded toward us.

Speaking of Master Cockeye reminds me that he was a very well-fed and well-natured fellow, notwithstanding his practical jokes, his natural deformity, his consequent ugliness, and his invariable silence. Upon being questioned as to the nature of his particular duties, he replied that he pulled up the fish-traps, took a mouth to stand upon the bows of his boat with a long pole in his hand, to keep her in deep water, to cry out to the trackers when they were about enough to bear her weight, to beat the gong when they were too far, to lead the song when the boatmen were poling, and to exercise a general supervision over the different parts of the junk; and it must be confessed that, though a Pagan, he did his duty with diligence. As to his distorted eye which had first discovered the great inland sea of Mr. Josh, and it was his screeching voice which had raised the cry of "Land," when he was riding gracefully (?), after the manner of Lucretia upon a balcony, only "a little more so," upon the end of his twenty-foot pole, to breast the junk away from inland water, or else attacking the gong or screaming at the top of his voice, "Ah-ah-ah! lo-lo-lo-a!" (Pull away! pull away!) And this cry reminded us strongly that part of the duty of every man at the moment of parting company with a favorite book, is to write some remarks imagining something of that sort happening to him.

Much has been written by travelers regarding the great extent and destitution of the interior of China. During our passage to this place we have seen but four small cities of from ten to twelve thousand people each, and no towns, or villages, or hamlets, or houses, or men, women, and children, or even a single hut, or cabin, or shanty, or "shebang," by the way, as we have been told, that we have ever met with. Now we feel ashamed of having paid "twelve dollars the thousand" for the Manilla cheroots which we had after throwing away the pouch. They ran pointfully, tumbled over each other, and cried, "A policeman this way!" picked up the money and divided it among them. Perhaps I was mistaken, but it seemed as if the crew generally participated in the outlay as a very unnecessary expenditure of funds.

We were received at Tsong-chan by a grand illumination, the reflection of which, in our entire escort on board of "Junk No. 1," to congratulate the Minister upon our safe arrival, had a very magical exchange of compliments, Master Tung, the head mandarin, observed that heaven had so far smiled upon our voyage, and that it was to be hoped it would please us to continue the journey in the morning, chorus would like to sing.

"Chorus!" The very name sent a chill to our convalescent bones, and impregnated our minds with the sort of sense more than suspicion that in taking it for granted that we had already reached the limit of Chinese evils, we unfortunately reckoned be "only four hours more;" but we had no idea of what was in store for us. I will be brief, and say that the four hours expanded into eight, that the 1,000 li miles from Tsong-chan to this place, and that they are connected by a line of mandarin escort on board of "Junk No. 1," to congratulate the Minister upon our safe arrival, by a grand exchange of compliments, Master Tung, the head mandarin, observed that heaven had so far smiled upon our voyage, and that it was to be hoped it would please us to continue the journey in the morning, chorus would like to sing.

"Chorus!" The very name sent a chill to our convalescent bones, and impregnated our minds with the sort of sense more than suspicion that in taking it for granted that we had already reached the limit of Chinese evils, we unfortunately reckoned be "only four hours more;" but we had no idea of what was in store for us. I will be brief, and say that the four hours expanded into eight, that the eight hours expanded into twenty-four, and that they are connected by a line of mandarin boats from Tsong-chan to this place, and that they are connected by a line of mandarin escort on board of "Junk No. 1," to congratulate the Minister upon our safe arrival, by a grand exchange of compliments, Master Tung, the head mandarin, observed that heaven had so far smiled upon our voyage, and that it was to be hoped it would please us to continue the journey in the morning, chorus would like to sing.

"Chorus!" The very name sent a chill to our convalescent bones, and impregnated our minds with the sort of sense more than suspicion that in taking it for granted that we had already reached the limit of Chinese evils, we unfortunately reckoned be "only four hours more;" but we had no idea of what was in store for us. I will be brief, and say that the four hours expanded into eight, that the eight hours expanded into twenty-four, that the twenty-four expanded into forty-eight, and that they are connected by a line of mandarin boats from Tsong-chan to this place, and that they are connected by a line of mandarin escort on board of "Junk No. 1," to congratulate the Minister upon our safe arrival, by a grand exchange of compliments, Master Tung, the head mandarin, observed that heaven had so far smiled upon our voyage, and that it was to be hoped it would please us to continue the journey in the morning, chorus would like to sing.

"Chorus!" The very name sent a chill to our convalescent bones, and impregnated our minds with the sort of sense more than suspicion that in taking it for granted that we had already reached the limit of Chinese evils, we unfortunately reckoned be "only four hours more;" but we had no idea of what was in store for us. I will be brief, and say that the four hours expanded into eight, that the eight hours expanded into twenty-four, that the twenty-four expanded into forty-eight, that the forty-eight expanded into ninety-six, and that they are connected by a line of mandarin boats from Tsong-chan to this place, and that they are connected by a line of mandarin escort on board of "Junk No. 1," to congratulate the Minister upon our safe arrival, by a grand exchange of compliments, Master Tung, the head mandarin, observed that heaven had so far smiled upon our voyage, and that it was to be hoped it would please us to continue the journey in the morning, chorus would like to sing.

"Chorus!" The very name sent a chill to our convalescent bones, and impregnated our minds with the sort of sense more than suspicion that in taking it for granted that we had already reached the limit of Chinese evils, we unfortunately reckoned be "only four hours more;" but we had no idea of what was in store for us. I will be brief, and say that the four hours expanded into eight, that the eight hours expanded into twenty-four, that the twenty-four expanded into forty-eight, that the forty-eight expanded into ninety-six, that the ninety-six expanded into one hundred and ninety-two, and that they are connected by a line of mandarin boats from Tsong-chan to this place, and that they are connected by a line of mandarin escort on board of "Junk No. 1," to congratulate the Minister upon our safe arrival, by a grand exchange of compliments, Master Tung, the head mandarin, observed that heaven had so far smiled upon our voyage, and that it was to be hoped it would please us to continue the journey in the morning, chorus would like to sing.

"Chorus!" The very name sent a chill to our convalescent bones, and impregnated our minds with the sort of sense more than suspicion that in taking it for granted that we had already reached the limit of Chinese evils, we unfortunately reckoned be "only four hours more;" but we had no idea of what was in store for us. I will be brief, and say that the four hours expanded into eight, that the eight hours expanded into twenty-four, that the twenty-four expanded into forty-eight, that the forty-eight expanded into ninety-six, that the ninety-six expanded into one hundred and ninety-two, that the one hundred and ninety-two expanded into three hundred and eighty-four, and that they are connected by a line of mandarin boats from Tsong-chan to this place, and that they are connected by a line of mandarin escort on board of "Junk No. 1," to congratulate the Minister upon our safe arrival, by a grand exchange of compliments, Master Tung, the head mandarin, observed that heaven had so far smiled upon our voyage, and that it was to be hoped it would please us to continue the journey in the morning, chorus would like to sing.

"Chorus!" The very name sent a chill to our convalescent bones, and impregnated our minds with the sort of sense more than suspicion that in taking it for granted that we had already reached the limit of Chinese evils, we unfortunately reckoned be "only four hours more;" but we had no idea of what was in store for us. I will be brief, and say that the four hours expanded into eight, that the eight hours expanded into twenty-four, that the twenty-four expanded into forty-eight, that the forty-eight expanded into ninety-six, that the ninety-six expanded into one hundred and ninety-two, that the one hundred and ninety-two expanded into three hundred and eighty-four, that the three hundred and eighty-four expanded into seven hundred and sixty-eight, and that they are connected by a line of mandarin boats from Tsong-chan to this place, and that they are connected by a line of mandarin escort on board of "Junk No. 1," to congratulate the Minister upon our safe arrival, by a grand exchange of compliments, Master Tung, the head mandarin, observed that heaven had so far smiled upon our voyage, and that it was to be hoped it would please us to continue the journey in the morning, chorus would like to sing.

"Chorus!" The very name sent a chill to our convalescent bones, and impregnated our minds with the sort of sense more than suspicion that in taking it for granted that we had already reached the limit of Chinese evils, we unfortunately reckoned be "only four hours more;" but we had no idea of what was in store for us. I will be brief, and say that the four hours expanded into eight, that the eight hours expanded into twenty-four, that the twenty-four expanded into forty-eight, that the forty-eight expanded into ninety-six, that the ninety-six expanded into one hundred and ninety-two, that the one hundred and ninety-two expanded into three hundred and eighty-four, that the three hundred and eighty-four expanded into seven hundred and sixty-eight, that the seven hundred and sixty-eight expanded into one thousand five hundred and thirty-six, and that they are connected by a line of mandarin boats from Tsong-chan to this place, and that they are connected by a line of mandarin escort on board of "Junk No. 1," to congratulate the Minister upon our safe arrival, by a grand exchange of compliments, Master Tung, the head mandarin, observed that heaven had so far smiled upon our voyage, and that it was to be hoped it would please us to continue the journey in the morning, chorus would like to sing.

"Chorus!" The very name sent a chill to our convalescent bones, and impregnated our minds with the sort of sense more than suspicion that in taking it for granted that we had already reached the limit of Chinese evils, we unfortunately reckoned be "only four hours more;" but we had no idea of what was in store for us. I will be brief, and say that the four hours expanded into eight, that the eight hours expanded into twenty-four, that the twenty-four expanded into forty-eight, that the forty-eight expanded into ninety-six, that the ninety-six expanded into one hundred and ninety-two, that the one hundred and ninety-two expanded into three hundred and eighty-four, that the three hundred and eighty-four expanded into seven hundred and sixty-eight, that the seven hundred and sixty-eight expanded into one thousand five hundred and thirty-six, that the one thousand five hundred and thirty-six expanded into three thousand and seventy-two, and that they are connected by a line of mandarin boats from Tsong-chan to this place, and that they are connected by a line of mandarin escort on board of "Junk No. 1," to congratulate the Minister upon our safe arrival, by a grand exchange of compliments, Master Tung, the head mandarin, observed that heaven had so far smiled upon our voyage, and that it was to be hoped it would please us to continue the journey in the morning, chorus would like to sing.

"Chorus!" The very name sent a chill to our convalescent bones, and impregnated our minds with the sort of sense more than suspicion that in taking it for granted that we had already reached the limit of Chinese evils, we unfortunately reckoned be "only four hours more;" but we had no idea of what was in store for us. I will be brief, and say that the four hours expanded into eight, that the eight hours expanded into twenty-four, that the twenty-four expanded into forty-eight, that the forty-eight expanded into ninety-six, that the ninety-six expanded into one hundred and ninety-two, that the one hundred and ninety-two expanded into three hundred and eighty-four, that the three hundred and eighty-four expanded into seven hundred and sixty-eight, that the seven hundred and sixty-eight expanded into one thousand five hundred and thirty-six, that the one thousand five hundred and thirty-six expanded into three thousand and seventy-two, that the three thousand and seventy-two expanded into six thousand one hundred and forty-four, and that they are connected by a line of mandarin boats from Tsong-chan to this place, and that they are connected by a line of mandarin escort on board of "Junk No. 1," to congratulate the Minister upon our safe arrival, by a grand exchange of compliments, Master Tung, the head mandarin, observed that heaven had so far smiled upon our voyage, and that it was to be hoped it would please us to continue the journey in the morning, chorus would like to sing.

"Chorus!" The very name sent a chill to our convalescent bones, and impregnated our minds with the sort of sense more than suspicion that in taking it for granted that we had already reached the limit of Chinese evils, we unfortunately reckoned be "only four hours more;" but we had no idea of what was in store for us. I will be brief, and say that the four hours expanded into eight, that the eight hours expanded into twenty-four, that the twenty-four expanded into forty-eight, that the forty-eight expanded into ninety-six, that the ninety-six expanded into one hundred and ninety-two, that the one hundred and ninety-two expanded into three hundred and eighty-four, that the three hundred and eighty-four expanded into seven hundred and sixty-eight, that the seven hundred and sixty-eight expanded into one thousand five hundred and thirty-six, that the one thousand five hundred and thirty-six expanded into three thousand and seventy-two, that the three thousand and seventy-two expanded into six thousand one hundred and forty-four, that the six thousand one hundred and forty-four expanded into twelve thousand two hundred and eighty-eight, and that they are connected by a line of mandarin boats from Tsong-chan to this place, and that they are connected by a line of mandarin escort on board of "Junk No. 1," to congratulate the Minister upon our safe arrival, by a grand exchange of compliments, Master Tung, the head mandarin, observed that heaven had so far smiled upon our voyage, and that it was to be hoped it would please us to continue the journey in the morning, chorus would like to sing.

"Chorus!" The very name sent a chill to our convalescent bones, and impregnated our minds with the sort of sense more than suspicion that in taking it for granted that we had already reached the limit of Chinese evils, we unfortunately reckoned be "only four hours more;" but we had no idea of what was in store for us. I will be brief, and say that the four hours expanded into eight, that the eight hours expanded into twenty-four, that the twenty-four expanded into forty-eight, that the forty-eight expanded into ninety-six, that the ninety-six expanded into one hundred and ninety-two, that the one hundred and ninety-two expanded into three hundred and eighty-four, that the three hundred and eighty-four expanded into seven hundred and sixty-eight, that the seven hundred and sixty-eight expanded into one thousand five hundred and thirty-six, that the one thousand five hundred and thirty-six expanded into three thousand and seventy-two, that the three thousand and seventy-two expanded into six thousand one hundred and forty-four, that the six thousand one hundred and forty-four expanded into twelve thousand two hundred and eighty-eight, that the twelve thousand two hundred and eighty-eight expanded into twenty-four thousand five hundred and seventy-six, and that they are connected by a line of mandarin boats from Tsong-chan to this place, and that they are connected by a line of mandarin escort on board of "Junk No. 1," to congratulate the Minister upon our safe arrival, by a grand exchange of compliments, Master Tung, the head mandarin, observed that heaven had so far smiled upon our voyage, and that it was to be hoped it would please us to continue the journey in the morning, chorus would like to sing.

"Chorus!" The very name sent a chill to our convalescent bones, and impregnated our minds with the sort of sense more than suspicion that in taking it for granted that we had already reached the limit of Chinese evils, we unfortunately reckoned be "only four hours more;" but we had no idea of what was in store for us. I will be brief, and say that the four hours expanded into eight, that the eight hours expanded into twenty-four, that the twenty-four expanded into forty-eight, that the forty-eight expanded into ninety-six, that the ninety-six expanded into one hundred and ninety-two, that the one hundred and ninety-two expanded into three hundred and eighty-four, that the three hundred and eighty-four expanded into seven hundred and sixty-eight, that the seven hundred and sixty-eight expanded into one thousand five hundred and thirty-six, that the one thousand five hundred and thirty-six expanded into three thousand and seventy-two, that the three thousand and seventy-two expanded into six thousand one hundred and forty-four, that the six thousand one hundred and forty-four expanded into twelve thousand two hundred and eighty-eight, that the twelve thousand two hundred and eighty-eight expanded into twenty-four thousand five hundred and seventy-six, that the twenty-four thousand five hundred and seventy-six expanded into forty-nine thousand one hundred and fifty-two, and that they are connected by a line of mandarin boats from Tsong-chan to this place, and that they are connected by a line of mandarin escort on board of "Junk No. 1," to congratulate the Minister upon our safe arrival, by a grand exchange of compliments, Master Tung, the head mandarin, observed that heaven had so far smiled upon our voyage, and that it was to be hoped it would please us to continue the journey in the morning, chorus would like to sing.

"Chorus!" The very name sent a chill to our convalescent bones, and impregnated our minds with the sort of sense more than suspicion that in taking it for granted that we had already reached the limit of Chinese evils, we unfortunately reckoned be "only four hours more;" but we had no idea of what was in store for us. I will be brief, and say that the four hours expanded into eight, that the eight hours expanded into twenty-four, that the twenty-four expanded into forty-eight, that the forty-eight expanded into ninety-six, that the ninety-six expanded into one hundred and ninety-two, that the one hundred and ninety-two expanded into three hundred and eighty-four, that the three hundred and eighty-four expanded into seven hundred and sixty-eight, that the seven hundred and sixty-eight expanded into one thousand five hundred and thirty-six, that the one thousand five hundred and thirty-six expanded into three thousand and seventy-two, that the three thousand and seventy-two expanded into six thousand one hundred and forty-four, that the six thousand one hundred and forty-four expanded into twelve thousand two hundred and eighty-eight, that the twelve thousand two hundred and eighty-eight expanded into twenty-four thousand five hundred and seventy-six, that the twenty-four thousand five hundred and seventy-six expanded into forty-nine thousand one hundred and fifty-two, that the forty-nine thousand one hundred and fifty-two expanded into ninety-eight thousand three hundred and four, and that they are connected by a line of mandarin boats from Tsong-chan to this place, and that they are connected by a line of mandarin escort on board of "Junk No. 1," to congratulate the Minister upon our safe arrival, by a grand exchange of compliments, Master Tung, the head mandarin, observed that heaven had so far smiled upon our voyage, and that it was to be hoped it would please us to continue the journey in the morning, chorus would like to sing.

"Chorus!" The very name sent a chill to our convalescent bones, and impregnated our minds with the sort of sense more than suspicion that in taking it for granted that we had already reached the limit of Chinese evils, we unfortunately reckoned be "only four hours more;" but we had no idea of what was in store for us. I will be brief, and say that the four hours expanded into eight, that the eight hours expanded into twenty-four, that the twenty-four expanded into forty-eight, that the forty-eight expanded into ninety-six, that the ninety-six expanded into one hundred and ninety-two, that the one hundred and ninety-two expanded into three hundred and eighty-four, that the three hundred and eighty-four expanded into seven hundred and sixty-eight, that the seven hundred and sixty-eight expanded into one thousand five hundred and thirty-six, that the one thousand five hundred and thirty-six expanded into three thousand and seventy-two, that the three thousand and seventy-two expanded into six thousand one hundred and forty-four, that the six thousand one hundred and forty-four expanded into twelve thousand two hundred and eighty-eight, that the twelve thousand two hundred and eighty-eight expanded into twenty-four thousand five hundred and seventy-six, that the twenty-four thousand five hundred and seventy-six expanded into forty-nine thousand one hundred and fifty-two, that the forty-nine thousand one hundred and fifty-two expanded into ninety-eight thousand three hundred and four, that the ninety-eight thousand three hundred and four expanded into one hundred and ninety-six thousand six hundred and eight, and that they are connected by a line of mandarin boats from Tsong-chan to this place, and that they are connected by a line of mandarin escort on board of "Junk No. 1," to congratulate the Minister upon our safe arrival, by a grand exchange of compliments, Master Tung, the head mandarin, observed that heaven had so far smiled upon our voyage, and that it was to be hoped it would please us to continue the journey in the morning, chorus would like to sing.

"Chorus!" The very name sent a chill to our convalescent bones, and impregnated our minds with the sort of sense more than suspicion that in taking it for granted that we had already reached the limit of Chinese evils, we unfortunately reckoned be "only four hours more;" but we had no idea of what was in store for us. I will be brief, and say that the four hours expanded into eight, that the eight hours expanded into twenty-four, that the twenty-four expanded into forty-eight, that the forty-eight expanded into ninety-six, that the ninety-six expanded into one hundred and ninety-two, that the one hundred and ninety-two expanded into three hundred and eighty-four, that the three hundred and eighty-four expanded into seven hundred and sixty-eight, that the seven hundred and sixty-eight expanded into one thousand five hundred and thirty-six, that the one thousand five hundred and thirty-six expanded into three thousand and seventy-two, that the three thousand and seventy-two expanded into six thousand one hundred and forty-four, that the six thousand one hundred and forty-four expanded into twelve thousand two hundred and eighty-eight, that the twelve thousand two hundred and eighty-eight expanded into twenty-four thousand five hundred and seventy-six, that the twenty-four thousand five hundred and seventy-six expanded into forty-nine thousand one hundred and fifty-two, that the forty-nine thousand one hundred and fifty-two expanded into ninety-eight thousand three hundred and four, that the ninety-eight thousand three hundred and four expanded into one hundred and ninety-six thousand six hundred and eight, that the one hundred and ninety-six thousand six hundred and eight expanded into three hundred and ninety-three thousand three hundred and sixteen, and that they are connected by a line of mandarin boats from Tsong-chan to this place, and that they are connected by a line of mandarin escort on board of "Junk No. 1," to congratulate the Minister upon our safe arrival, by a grand exchange of compliments, Master Tung, the head mandarin, observed that heaven had so far smiled upon our voyage, and that it was to be hoped it would please us to continue the journey in the morning, chorus would like to sing.

"Chorus!" The very name sent a chill to our convalescent bones, and impregnated our minds with the sort of sense more than suspicion that in taking it for granted that we had already reached the limit of Chinese evils, we unfortunately reckoned be "only four hours more;" but we had no idea of what was in store for us. I will be brief, and say that the four hours expanded into eight, that the eight hours expanded into twenty-four, that the twenty-four expanded into forty-eight, that the forty-eight expanded into ninety-six, that the ninety-six expanded into one hundred and ninety-two, that the one hundred and ninety-two expanded into three hundred and eighty-four, that the three hundred and eighty-four expanded into seven hundred and sixty-eight, that the seven hundred and sixty-eight expanded into one thousand five hundred and thirty-six, that the one thousand five hundred and thirty-six expanded into three thousand and seventy-two, that the three thousand and seventy-two expanded into six thousand one hundred and forty-four, that the six thousand one hundred and forty-four expanded into twelve thousand two hundred and eighty-eight, that the twelve thousand two hundred and eighty-eight expanded into twenty-four thousand five hundred and seventy-six, that the twenty-four thousand five hundred and seventy-six expanded into forty-nine thousand one hundred and fifty-two, that the forty-nine thousand one hundred and fifty-two expanded into ninety-eight thousand three hundred and four, that the ninety-eight thousand three hundred and four expanded into one hundred and ninety-six thousand six hundred and eight, that the one hundred and ninety-six thousand six hundred and eight expanded into three hundred and ninety-three thousand three hundred and sixteen, that the three hundred and ninety-three thousand three hundred and sixteen expanded into seven hundred and eighty-six thousand six hundred and thirty-two, and that they are connected by a line of mandarin boats from Tsong-chan to this place, and that they are connected by a line of mandarin escort on board of "Junk No. 1," to congratulate the Minister upon our safe arrival, by a grand exchange of compliments, Master Tung, the head mandarin, observed that heaven had so far smiled upon our voyage, and that it was to be hoped it would please us to continue the journey in the morning, chorus would like to sing.

"Chorus!" The very name sent a chill to our convalescent bones, and impregnated our minds with the sort of sense more than suspicion that in taking it for granted that we had already reached the limit of Chinese evils, we unfortunately reckoned be "only four hours more;" but we had no idea of what was in store for us. I will be brief, and say that the four hours expanded into eight, that the eight hours expanded into twenty-four, that the twenty-four expanded into forty-eight, that the forty-eight expanded into ninety-six, that the ninety-six expanded into one hundred and ninety-two, that the one hundred and ninety-two expanded into three hundred and eighty-four, that the three hundred and eighty-four expanded into seven hundred and sixty-eight, that the seven hundred and sixty-eight expanded into one thousand five hundred and thirty-six, that the one thousand five hundred and thirty-six expanded into three thousand and seventy-two, that the three thousand and seventy-two expanded into six thousand one hundred and forty-four, that the six thousand one hundred and forty-four expanded into twelve thousand two hundred and eighty-eight, that the twelve thousand two hundred and eighty-eight expanded into twenty-four thousand five hundred and seventy-six, that the twenty-four thousand five hundred and seventy-six expanded into forty-nine thousand one hundred and fifty-two, that the forty-nine thousand one hundred and fifty-two expanded into ninety-eight thousand three hundred and four, that the ninety-eight thousand three hundred and four expanded into one hundred and ninety-six thousand six hundred and eight, that the one hundred and ninety-six thousand six hundred and eight expanded into three hundred and ninety-three thousand three hundred and sixteen, that the three hundred and ninety-three thousand three hundred and sixteen expanded into seven hundred and eighty-six thousand six hundred and thirty-two, that the seven hundred and eighty-six thousand six hundred and thirty-two expanded into one million five hundred and seventy-three thousand two hundred and sixty-four, and that they are connected by a line of mandarin boats from Tsong-chan to this place, and that they are connected by a line of mandarin escort on board of "Junk No. 1," to congratulate the Minister upon our safe arrival, by a grand exchange of compliments, Master Tung, the head mandarin, observed that heaven had so far smiled upon our voyage, and that it was to be hoped it would please us to continue the journey in the morning, chorus would like to sing.

"Chorus!" The very name sent a chill to our convalescent bones, and impregnated our minds with the sort of sense more than suspicion that in taking it for granted that we had already reached the limit of Chinese evils, we unfortunately reckoned be "only four hours more;" but we had no idea of what was in store for us. I will be brief, and say that the four hours expanded into eight, that the eight hours expanded into twenty-four, that the twenty-four expanded into forty-eight, that the forty-eight expanded into ninety-six, that the ninety-six expanded into one hundred and ninety-two, that the one hundred and ninety-two expanded into three hundred and eighty-four, that the three hundred and eighty-four expanded into seven hundred and sixty-eight, that the seven hundred and sixty-eight expanded into one thousand five hundred and thirty-six, that the one thousand five hundred and thirty-six expanded into three thousand and seventy-two, that the three thousand and seventy-two expanded into six thousand one hundred and forty-four, that the six thousand one hundred and forty-four expanded into twelve thousand two hundred and eighty-eight, that the twelve thousand two hundred and eighty-eight expanded into twenty-four thousand five hundred and seventy-six, that the twenty-four thousand five hundred and seventy-six expanded into forty-nine thousand one hundred and fifty-two, that the forty-nine thousand one hundred and fifty-two expanded into ninety-eight thousand three hundred and four, that the ninety-eight thousand three hundred and four expanded into one hundred and ninety-six thousand six hundred and eight, that the one hundred and ninety-six thousand six hundred and eight expanded into three hundred and ninety-three thousand three hundred and sixteen, that the three hundred and ninety-three thousand three hundred and sixteen expanded into seven hundred and eighty-six thousand six hundred and thirty-two, that the seven hundred and eighty-six thousand six hundred and thirty-two expanded into one million five hundred and seventy-three thousand two hundred and sixty-four, that the one million five hundred and seventy-three thousand two hundred and sixty-four expanded into three million one hundred and forty-six thousand five hundred and twenty-eight, and that they are connected by a line of mandarin boats from Tsong-chan to this place, and that they are connected by a line of mandarin escort on board of "Junk No. 1," to congratulate the Minister upon our safe arrival, by a grand exchange of compliments, Master Tung, the head mandarin, observed that heaven had so far smiled upon our voyage, and that it was to be hoped it would please us to continue the journey in the morning, chorus would like to sing.

"Chorus!" The very name sent a chill to our convalescent bones, and impregnated our minds with the sort of sense more than suspicion that in taking it for granted that we had already reached the limit of Chinese evils, we unfortunately reckoned be "only four hours more;" but we had no idea of what was in store for us. I will be brief, and say that the four hours expanded into eight, that the eight hours expanded into twenty-four, that the twenty-four expanded into forty-eight, that the forty-eight expanded into ninety-six, that the ninety-six expanded into one hundred and ninety-two, that the one hundred and ninety-two expanded into three hundred and eighty-four, that the three hundred and eighty-four expanded into seven hundred and sixty-eight, that the seven hundred and sixty-eight expanded into one thousand five hundred and thirty-six, that the one thousand five hundred and thirty-six expanded into three thousand and seventy-two, that the three thousand and seventy-two expanded into six thousand one hundred and forty-four, that the six thousand one hundred and forty-four expanded into twelve thousand two hundred and eighty-eight, that the twelve thousand two hundred and eighty-eight expanded into twenty-four thousand five hundred and seventy-six, that the twenty-four thousand five hundred and seventy-six expanded into forty-nine thousand one hundred and fifty-two, that the forty-nine thousand one hundred and fifty-two expanded into ninety-eight thousand three hundred and four, that the ninety-eight thousand three hundred and four expanded into one hundred and ninety-six thousand six hundred and eight, that the one hundred and ninety-six thousand six hundred and eight expanded into three hundred and ninety-three thousand three hundred and sixteen, that the three hundred and ninety-three thousand three hundred and sixteen expanded into seven hundred and eighty-six thousand six hundred and thirty-two, that the seven hundred and eighty-six thousand six hundred and thirty-two expanded into one million five hundred and seventy-three thousand two hundred and sixty-four, that the one million five hundred and seventy-three thousand two hundred and sixty-four expanded into three million one hundred and forty-six thousand five hundred and twenty-eight, that the three million one hundred and forty-six thousand five hundred and twenty-eight expanded into six million two hundred and ninety-three thousand and fifty-six, and that they are connected by a line of mandarin boats from Tsong-chan to this place, and that they are connected by a line of mandarin escort on board of "Junk No. 1," to congratulate the Minister upon our safe arrival, by a grand exchange of compliments, Master Tung, the head mandarin, observed that heaven had so far smiled upon our voyage, and that it was to be hoped it would please us to continue the journey in the morning, chorus would like to sing.

"Chorus!" The very name sent a chill to our convalescent bones, and impregnated our minds with the sort of sense more than suspicion that in taking it for granted that we had already reached the limit of Chinese evils, we unfortunately reckoned be "only four hours more;" but we had no idea of what was in store for us. I will be brief, and say that the four hours expanded into eight, that the eight hours expanded into twenty-four, that the twenty-four expanded into forty-eight, that the forty-eight expanded into ninety-six, that the ninety-six expanded into one hundred and ninety-two, that the one hundred and ninety-two expanded into three hundred and eighty-four, that the three hundred and eighty-four expanded into seven hundred and sixty-eight, that the seven hundred and sixty-eight expanded into one thousand five hundred and thirty-six, that the one thousand five hundred and thirty-six expanded into three thousand and seventy-two, that the three thousand and seventy-two expanded into six thousand one hundred and forty-four, that the six thousand one hundred and forty-four expanded into twelve thousand two hundred and eighty-eight, that the twelve thousand two hundred and eighty-eight expanded into twenty-four thousand five hundred and seventy-six, that the twenty-four thousand five hundred and seventy-six expanded into forty-nine thousand one hundred and fifty-two, that the forty-nine thousand one hundred and fifty-two expanded into ninety-eight thousand three hundred and four, that the ninety-eight thousand three hundred and four expanded into one hundred and ninety-six thousand six hundred and eight, that the one hundred and ninety-six thousand six hundred and eight expanded into three hundred and ninety-three thousand three hundred and sixteen, that the three hundred and ninety-three thousand three hundred and sixteen expanded into seven hundred and eighty-six thousand six hundred and thirty-two, that the seven hundred and eighty-six thousand six hundred and thirty-two expanded into one million five hundred and seventy-three thousand two hundred and sixty-four, that the one million five hundred and seventy-three thousand two hundred and sixty-four expanded into three million one hundred and forty-six thousand five hundred and twenty-eight, that the three million one hundred and forty-six thousand five hundred and twenty-eight expanded into six million two hundred and ninety-three thousand and fifty-six, that the six million two hundred and ninety-three thousand and fifty-six expanded into twelve million five hundred and eighty-six thousand one hundred and twelve, and that they are connected by a line of mandarin boats from Tsong-chan to this place, and that they are connected by a line of mandarin escort on board of "Junk No. 1," to congratulate the Minister upon our safe arrival, by a grand exchange of compliments, Master Tung, the head mandarin, observed that heaven had so far smiled upon our voyage, and that it was to be hoped it would please us to continue the journey in the morning, chorus would like to sing.

"Chorus!" The very name sent a chill to our convalescent bones, and impregnated our minds with the sort of sense more than suspicion that in taking it for granted that we had already reached the limit of Chinese evils, we unfortunately reckoned be "only four hours more;" but we had no idea of what was in store for us. I will be brief, and say that the four hours expanded into eight, that the eight hours expanded into twenty-four, that the twenty-four expanded into forty-eight, that the forty-eight expanded into ninety-six, that the ninety-six expanded into one hundred and ninety-two, that the one hundred and ninety-two expanded into three hundred and eighty-four, that the three hundred and eighty-four expanded into seven hundred and sixty-eight, that the seven hundred and sixty-eight expanded into one thousand five hundred and thirty-six, that the one thousand five hundred and thirty-six expanded into three thousand and seventy-two, that the three thousand and seventy-two expanded into six thousand one hundred and forty-four, that the six thousand one hundred and forty-four expanded into twelve thousand two hundred and eighty-eight, that the twelve thousand two hundred and eighty-eight expanded into twenty-four thousand five hundred and seventy-six, that the twenty-four thousand five hundred and seventy-six expanded into forty-nine thousand one hundred and fifty-two, that the forty-nine thousand one hundred and fifty-two expanded into ninety-eight thousand three hundred and four, that the ninety-eight thousand three hundred and four expanded into one hundred and ninety-six thousand six hundred and eight, that the one hundred and ninety-six thousand six hundred and eight expanded into three hundred and ninety-three thousand three hundred and sixteen, that the three hundred and ninety-three thousand three hundred and sixteen expanded into seven hundred and eighty-six thousand six hundred and thirty-two, that the seven hundred and eighty-six thousand six hundred and thirty-two expanded into one million five hundred and seventy-three thousand two hundred and sixty-four, that the one million five hundred and seventy-three thousand two hundred and sixty-four expanded into three million one hundred and forty-six thousand five hundred and twenty-eight, that the three million one hundred and forty-six thousand five hundred and twenty-eight expanded into six million two hundred and ninety-three thousand and fifty-six, that the six million two hundred and ninety-three thousand and fifty-six expanded into twelve million five hundred and eighty-six thousand one hundred and twelve, that the twelve million five hundred and eighty-six thousand one hundred and twelve expanded into twenty-five million one hundred and seventy-two thousand two hundred and twenty-four, and that they are connected by a line of mandarin boats from Tsong-chan to this place, and that they are connected by a line of mandarin escort on board of "Junk No. 1," to congratulate the Minister upon our safe arrival, by a grand exchange of compliments, Master Tung, the head mandarin, observed that heaven had so far smiled upon our voyage, and that it was to be hoped it would please us to continue the journey in the morning, chorus would like to sing.

"Chorus!" The very name sent a chill to our convalescent bones, and impregnated our minds with the sort of sense more than suspicion that in taking it for granted that we had already reached the limit of Chinese evils, we unfortunately reckoned be "only four hours more;" but we had no idea of what was in store for us. I will be brief, and say that the four hours expanded into eight, that the eight hours expanded into twenty-four, that the twenty-four expanded into forty-eight, that the forty-eight expanded into ninety-six, that the ninety-six expanded into one hundred and ninety-two, that the one hundred and ninety-two expanded into three hundred and eighty-four, that the three hundred and eighty-four expanded into seven hundred and sixty-eight, that the seven hundred and sixty-eight expanded into one thousand five hundred and thirty-six, that the one thousand five hundred and thirty-six expanded into three thousand and seventy-two, that the three thousand and seventy-two expanded into six thousand one hundred and forty-four, that the six thousand one hundred and forty-four expanded into twelve thousand two hundred and eighty-eight, that the twelve thousand two hundred and eighty-eight expanded into twenty-four thousand five hundred and seventy-six, that the twenty-four thousand five hundred and seventy-six expanded into forty-nine thousand one hundred and fifty-two, that the forty-nine thousand one hundred and fifty-two expanded into ninety-eight thousand three hundred and four, that the ninety-eight thousand three hundred and four expanded into one hundred and ninety-six thousand six hundred and eight, that the one hundred and ninety-six thousand six hundred and eight expanded into three hundred and ninety-three thousand three hundred and sixteen, that the three hundred and ninety-three thousand three hundred and sixteen expanded into seven hundred and eighty-six thousand six hundred and thirty-two, that the seven hundred and eighty-six thousand six hundred and thirty-two expanded into one million five hundred and seventy-three thousand two hundred and sixty-four, that the one million five hundred and seventy-three thousand two hundred and sixty-four expanded into three million one hundred and forty-six thousand five hundred and twenty-eight, that the three million one hundred and forty-six thousand five hundred and twenty-eight expanded into six million two hundred and ninety-three thousand and fifty-six, that the six million two hundred and ninety-three thousand and fifty-six expanded into twelve million five hundred and eighty-six thousand one hundred and twelve, that the twelve million five hundred and eighty-six thousand one hundred and twelve expanded into twenty-five million one hundred and seventy-two thousand two hundred and twenty-four, that the twenty-five million one hundred and seventy-two thousand two hundred and twenty-four expanded into fifty million three hundred and forty-four thousand four hundred and forty-eight, and that they are connected by a line of mandarin boats from Tsong-chan to this place, and that they are connected by a line of mandarin escort on board of "Junk No. 1," to congratulate the Minister upon our safe arrival, by a grand exchange of compliments, Master Tung, the head mandarin, observed that heaven had so far smiled upon our voyage, and that it was to be hoped it would please us to continue the journey in the morning, chorus would like to sing.

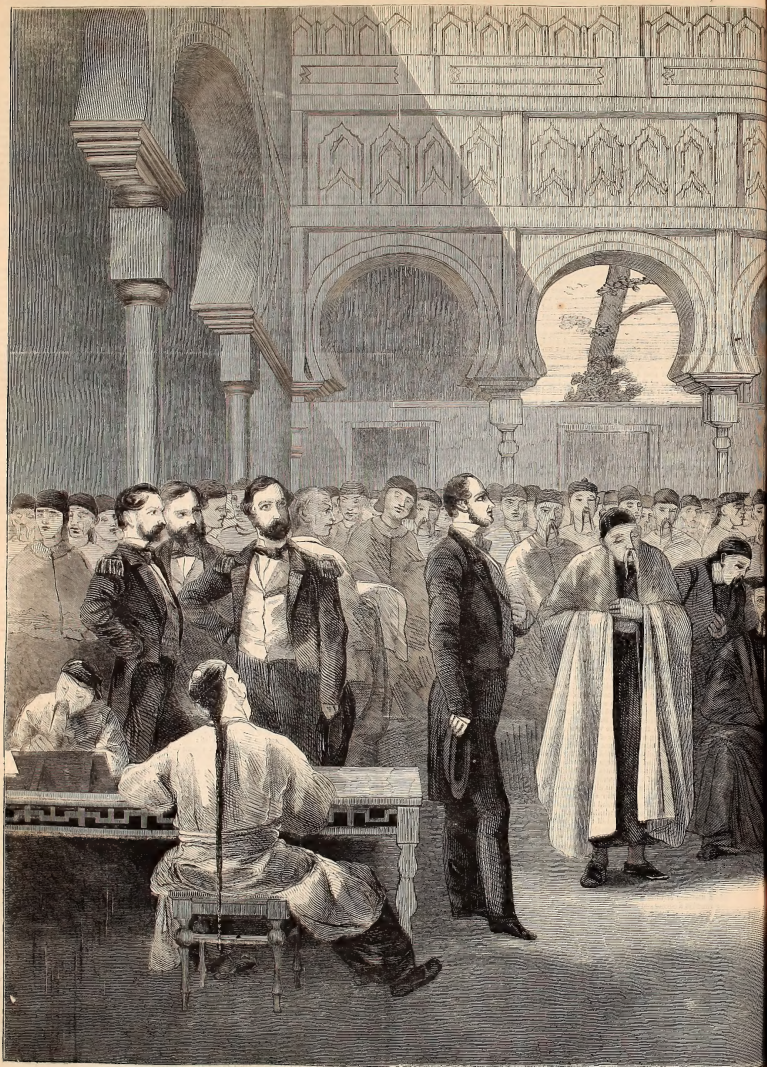
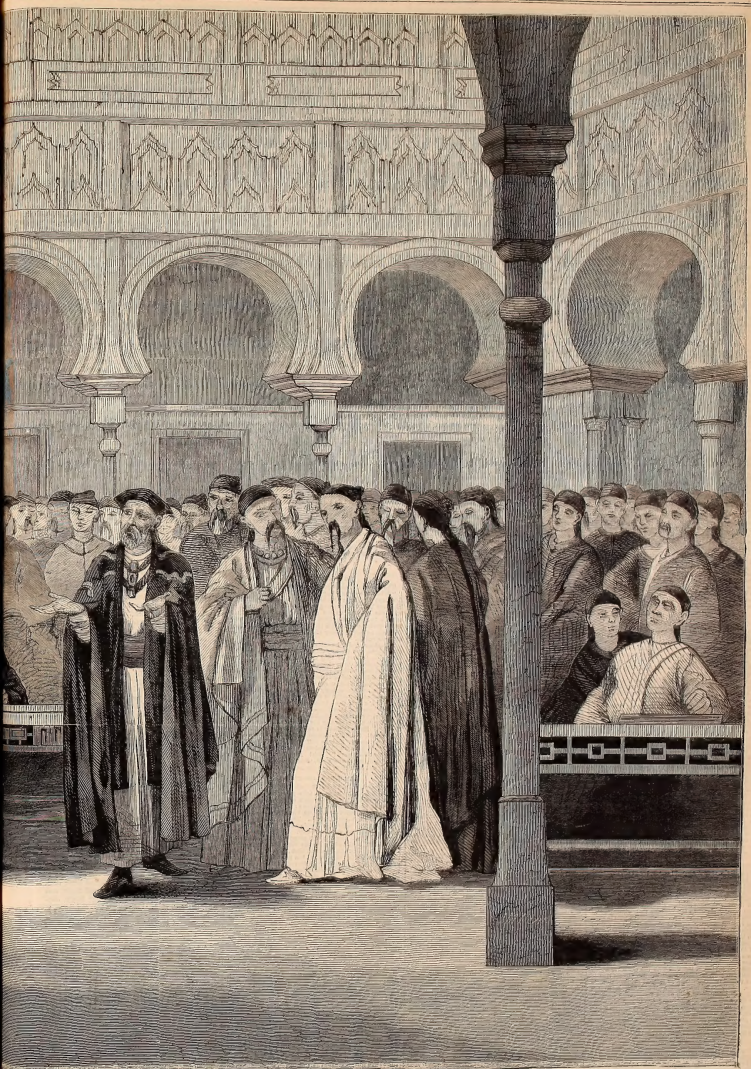
"Chorus!" The very name sent a chill to our convalescent bones, and impregnated our minds with the sort of sense more than suspicion that in taking it for granted that we had already reached the limit of Chinese evils, we unfortunately reckoned be "only four hours more;" but we had no idea of what was in store for us. I will be brief, and say that the four hours expanded into eight, that the eight hours expanded into twenty-four, that the twenty-four expanded into forty-eight, that the forty-eight expanded into ninety-six, that the ninety-six expanded into one hundred and ninety-two, that the one hundred and ninety-two expanded into three hundred and eighty-four, that the three hundred and eighty-four expanded into seven hundred and sixty-eight, that the seven hundred and sixty-eight expanded into one thousand five hundred and thirty-six, that the one thousand five hundred and thirty-six expanded into three thousand and seventy-two, that the three thousand and seventy-two expanded into six thousand one hundred and forty-four, that the six thousand one hundred and forty-four expanded into twelve thousand two hundred and eighty-eight, that the twelve thousand two hundred and eighty-eight expanded into twenty-four thousand five hundred and seventy-six, that the twenty-four thousand five hundred and seventy-six expanded into forty-nine thousand one hundred and fifty-two, that the forty-nine thousand one hundred and fifty-two expanded into ninety-eight thousand three hundred and four, that the ninety-eight thousand three hundred and four expanded into one hundred and ninety-six thousand six hundred and eight, that the one hundred and ninety-six thousand



INTERVIEW BETWEEN THE UNITED STATES MINISTER, MR. WARD, AND THE CHI



OMMISSIONERS, IN THE CITY HALL AT PEKIN, AUGUST, 1859.—[See preceding Pages.]

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

THE EXECUTION OF BROWN.

At eleven o'clock on 2d December the prisoner was brought out of the jail, accompanied by Sheriff Campbell and assistants, and Captain Avis, the Jailer.

As he came out the old companions of industry and one troop of horse, with General Taliaferro and his entire staff, were displaying in front of the Jail, while on each wagon with a pine box, in which was a fine oak coffin, was a company of infantry.

The prisoner was then seen, and spoke to everyone he recognized, and, walking down the steps, took a seat on the coffin box sitting like Jehu, in a wagon. He took with interest on the fine military display, but made no remarks. The wagon moved off, Brown's box on two of officers in close order. On reaching the field the military had distinctly formed square, the artillery unlimbered, and the citizens kept back, at the point of the bayonet, from taking any position, but into the square.

Brown was accompanied by no ministers, he desiring a religious service only in the jail or on the scaffold. On reaching the field where the gallows was erected the prisoner said, "I see some but military preparations for the instance? I am very citizens have been kept out." On reaching the gallows he observed, "I see Governor and Mayor Gwen standing near, to whom he said, "Gentlemen, good-by!" His voice not faltering.

ON THE GALLOWS.

The prisoner walked up the steps firmly, and was the first man on the gallows. Avis and Sheriff Campbell stood by his side, and after stooking upon the assembly an affectionate adieu, he thanked them for their kindness, when the cap was put over his face, and the rope around his neck. Avis asked him to step forward on the trap. He replied, "You must lead me, I cannot see." The rope was adjusted, and the military order given, "Not ready yet!" The unmarried commanders mounted, and took position as if an enemy were in sight, and were then ordered to "carry arms," the prisoner standing standing all the time. Avis inquired if he was not tired. Brown replied, "Not at all, only I wish it was over." Another hour in suspense!

While on the scaffold Sheriff Campbell asked him if he would take a handkerchief in his hand as a sign to the general when he was ready. He replied, "No, I do not want it—let us not delain me any longer than is absolutely necessary."

He was swung off at fifteen minutes past eleven. A slight grasping of the hands and twitching of the muscles were seen, and then all was quiet.

The body was several times examined, and the pulse had not ceased until fifteen minutes after suspension. The body was then cut down, placed in a rifle, and conveyed by the military to the Armory, where it remained for a short time to be carried to the ferry by a special train at four o'clock.

BROWN'S INTERVIEW WITH HIS FELLOW-PRISONERS.

The prisoner was, before execution, taken to the cell of Coppoick and Cook, where he bid them a long farewell, and not lottery their friends. He then handed them a quarter-dollar, saying he had no more use for money, and bade them adieu. He then visited Cook and Coppoick, and, shaking hands with them, said, "Good-by, Cook." To the latter he said, with more emotion, "What do you mean?" Brown answered, "Why, by stating that I am not to Harper's Ferry to-day." He replied, "Did you not tell me in Pittsburg to come to Harper's Ferry and that you would meet us at Harper's Ferry?" Brown: "No, Sir; you knew I protested against you coming." Cook replied, "Captain, you have treated me differently," at the same time dropping his head.

Brown then left Cook's cell, and went to Coppoick, to see the same false statements; but I am glad to hear you have contributed from them. Good-by, Sir." And they bended both a quarter. He shook both by the hand, and they parted.

The prisoner was then taken to the condemned cell, and likely interchanged greetings. Stevens said, "Good-by, Captain; I know you are going to your home." Brown replied, "I know I am." Brown told him to bear up and not betray his friends, as he was not going.

The prisoner then told the Sheriff he was ready, his arms were pinioned, and with a blank cartridge box and the same clothes he were during the trial, he proceeded to the fatal spot, between his sons and coffin.

INTERVIEW WITH HIS WIFE.

Mrs. Brown arrived at Charlestown on No. 1 to see her husband. The interview between them lasted from four o'clock in the afternoon until near eight in the evening, when General Taliaferro informed them that the period allowed had expired, and that it was his duty to pass for departure to the Ferry. Captain Brown urged that his wife be allowed to remain with him all night. To this the General refused to assent, allowing them but one hour more.

The interview was not a very sad one, as they had had a practical character, with regard to the future of herself and children, and the disposition and management of business affairs. They seemed considerably affected when they first met, but Mrs. Brown said that as the moments quite overcame, but Brown was as firm as a rock, and she soon regained her composure. There was no impression that the prisoner might possibly be forbidden with a weapon or with stupefying drugs, as has been done the interview her person was searched by the wife of the jailer, and everything was taken away from her which could by any possibility be used.

On first meeting they kissed and affectionately embraced, and Mrs. Brown shed a few tears, but immediately checked her feelings. They stood embraced, and she, shifting her position, the prisoner was for a moment unable to speak. The prisoner only gave way for a moment, and was soon calm and collected, and remained firm throughout the interview. At the close they shook hands, and Mrs. Brown, and as they parted he uttered the "God bless you and the children!" Mrs. Brown replied, "I will endeavor to meet you at all events hereafter." In her testimony, when she remained in town a few moments, and then left.

The interview took place in the parlor of Captain Avis, and that prisoner was first to leave. Mrs. Brown followed. They all left by side by side, and, after discussing family matters proceeded to business.

HIS WISHES ABOUT HIS PROPERTY.

He stated that he desired his property to pass entirely into her possession, and repeated to place full confidence in her ability to manage the property for the benefit of the younger children. He requested her to remain at North Elba, New York, on the farm belonging to it. He advised that his younger children should be educated, and that his daughters should be taught some occupation by which to live, to have them sent to a boarding-school. He then gave directions and dictated to Sheriff Campbell, by which directed that all his property should go to his wife, with the exception of a few presents and bequests which he made. To one of his sons-in-law he gave his gold watch, and to another a watch, while a third was directed to have a tomb or monument put over the grave of his father at North Elba, and have his name, age, and the manner of his death. Together with the cause for which he had suffered, inscribed upon it. He directs that in addition to what he will be in his wife's possession, Mrs. Tom to each of his children he bequeathed the sum of fifty dollars, to be paid by executors, and that if any one should refuse to be executor, and not answer coming to him from his father's estate. He also directed that Tom, to cost these dollars, shall be prosecuted to each of his grandchildren, and that fifty dollars each be paid to three individuals, whom he named, if they can be found, and if not, to their legal representatives.

ABOUT HIS DEATH.

The subject of the death of his two sons was spoken of, and Mrs. Brown remarked that she had made some effort, while she was at Harper's Ferry, to find the remains of her bodies, to which object she said Governor Barbour had kindly consented to give his assistance. Captain Brown remarked that he would also like the remains of his son Thompson removed if they could be found, but suggested that it would be best to take his body with the bodies of his four sons, and get a pile of pine logs and burn them all together. But it would be much better and less expensive to thus gather up all their ashes together and take them to their family graves.

Sheriff Campbell told him that this would not be permitted within the State, and Mrs. Brown objected to the proposition altogether.

This prisoner said that he contemplated his death with composure and calmness. It would be impossible to describe the scene, but it will ever be with God he should have his courage to endure it. It was his earnest belief that he should be thus legally sanctioned for the good of the cause, and that it would be more for it than if he had died without a tournament. Mrs. Brown becoming depressed at these remarks, he told her not to be so, that the Lord's spirit would soon be with her again, and that they would meet in a better world.

With regard to his execution, he said that he desired no religious ceremonies, and that he did not wish to be aided from ministers who connect or approve of the cruel wrong of slavery by their example. He said that he had no objection to the military attending, but that he considered these soldiers and a good old slave master, with their consent to God that they were doing the work of the instances of the whole clergy of the Commonwealth combined.

MRS. BROWN'S OPINIONS.

Mrs. Brown's opinions, as above, are rather repelled all attempt on his part to express sympathy with her under her affliction.

She remind the likes that Captain Brown had done no thing to disgrace himself, or to bring shame with dishonor, and declared that the ignominious character of the punishment was about to be inflicted upon him was an error as it was regard. She regarded him as a martyr, and as such he would be held in reverence by the world, and be to the wife of such a man. The gallows, she said, had no terrors for him, and he was not afraid to die. She had seen him since had been, both at morning ago, and that he was in the same frame of mind as when she left him.

PROCLAMATION BY GOVERNOR WISE.

Governor Wise issued the following proclamation on 25th ult.

A PROCLAMATION BY THE GOVERNOR.

Whereas, the late bloody and treasonable battle of the State to suppress combination to obstruct the due execution of the laws of the United States, and murder and treasonably in the county of Jefferson, and may have to call upon a sufficient force of the militia of the county of Jefferson, and to suppress such orders and take such measures as shall seem fit, and have appointed J. Lucius Davis my aide-de-camp, with the rank of colonel, and assistant to the Adjutant-General here, for the accommodation of the service.

Now, therefore, all persons are notified that the trains of the Winchester and Potomac Railroad Company are required to transport the troops, munitions of war, and necessary General Davis, for impressment on the 1st, 2d, and 3d December, 1859, and that the officers of the militia are hereby required to obey such orders and take such measures as shall seem fit, and have appointed J. Lucius Davis my aide-de-camp, with the rank of colonel, and assistant to the Adjutant-General here, for the accommodation of the service.

Given under my hand as Governor, and under the Seal of the Commonwealth, at Richmond, this 25th day of November, 1859, and in the eighty-fourth year of the Commonwealth.

By the Governor,

GEO. W. MUNFORD, Sec. of the Commonwealth.

ANOTHER PROCLAMATION.

The subjoined proclamation by the military and civic authorities was issued on the day previous to the execution:

PROCLAMATION.

In pursuance of instructions from the Governor of Virginia, notice is hereby given to all whom it may concern:

That, as heretofore, particularly from new until after Friday next, the 2d day of December, martial law will exist in the county of Jefferson and counties adjacent, having been declared by the commander-in-chief of the army, and give a satisfactory account of themselves, will be at once arrested.

That on, and for a proper period before that day, strangers will not be permitted to approach within the limits of the land of bring present at the execution of John Brown, Captain Brown, Coppoick, and Cook, and that all who shall attempt forced back, or arrested, without regard to the amount of force which may be necessary to be used for the purpose. Given under our hands on the 1st day of December, the citizens of Jefferson and the surrounding counties, and the commanding officer of the troops of the line, armed, not guard their own property.

The proclamation is couched in peremptory, clearly indicates that by so doing they will best consult their own safety.

No women or children will be allowed to come near the place of execution.

WM. B. TALIAFERRO, Maj. Gen. Com. Troops.
R. BARRETT CAMPBELL, Sheriff.
THOMAS C. GREEN, Mayor.
JAMES W. ROWLAND, Prosecuting Attorney.
JAMES M. CAMPBELL, Sheriff.
November 29, 1859.

THE PREVIOUS EXCITEMENT.

On the 1st instant the Washington correspondent of the Boston newspapers published at the North, were ejected from the Virginia Legislature. The Boston correspondent tickets and were very anxious to proceed, but were refused—a course which was determined to give a solitary, Governor Wise and the President of the road. They left in the afternoon train, and were followed by two local reporters to the Boston correspondent, and would have forcibly ejected them from the train. The Boston correspondent of the New York Tribune was also refused a ticket. The Associated Press correspondent was also refused a ticket. Although martial law has not yet been proclaimed, the Governor has issued a proclamation declaring, that subjects every one—even citizens—to great inconvenience. Many persons have been arrested, and others without arrest and examination. On the arrival of the train from Harper's Ferry, bringing to give a solitary, fury amount of themselves, were sent by an armed escort to the Charlestown jail. The Governor has even issued orders that all persons found in the streets, or in the vicinity of the jail, after nine o'clock, shall be arrested.

The Associated Press correspondent has been arrested, and the New York Tribune correspondent has been ordered to leave the town. The Associated Press correspondent has been arrested, and the New York Tribune correspondent has been ordered to leave the town.

PERSONAL.

The Utica Observer of Monday says: "We are pleased to learn that Mr. Hartright, the well known Utica musician to improve. His bodily and mental condition are quite favorable, and he is quite cheerful, and he sleeps better than when brought to the Asylum."

FOREIGN NEWS

ENGLAND.

TROUBLE BETWEEN ENGLAND AND FRANCE.

"We send to the New York Times: "From information derived from a vast number of independent sources, we are convinced that a feeling of intense irritation and distrust has existed in France since the peace of 1815, is at this moment more widespread than ever throughout the French Press, as grounded on all other subjects, is on this question of the Italian settlement. The articles which the Debats contains attacks upon England such as never before, in moments of the greatest irritation, have appeared in its decrease columns. The Gazette de France looks upon the Italian question as a mere pretext. The language the Univers is still more virulent that the organ of the Ultramontane party. The Constitutionnel and the Pays are the ministerial daily, and always praise old, and their tone is moderate. The Presse is the only daily paper that maintains the original tone of the Revolution of July country. The inhabitants of the departments from Brest to Strasbourg are convinced that the hostility of England is close, and, strange to say, burn with ardor for a war of which they do not see the end. The Emperor is in a fair representation of the present state of feeling in the departments. We believe the Emperor himself, himself would, if the question could be put to him, admit that it is. The Emperor is aware that the war is not popular, and that to his intervention alone we owe it that the Italian question has not ere this led to war. He already involved in an extremely conflict."

The London correspondent of the Times of late date states that a confidential communication of a high character has been addressed by the Minister of the Interior to the Prefects of France, with a view of preventing the effect produced in England by the violent language of the French Press. The communication urges on the efforts such journals to be more circumspect. The Minister of the Interior, while defending energetically the rights of the country, might easily avoid offending the susceptibilities of a friendly power by the tone of his conduct. Also, that the dignity of the Imperial policy and the maintenance of the interests of the alliance of France and the maintenance of peace.

FRANCE.

THE WAR WITH THE ARABS.

The Times correspondent says:

"When one of those Arab skirmishers announced a few days ago, from Compiegne, that Her Majesty, the Empress, was going to, General ordered a regiment to its place adopted woolen shells for dresses, cut short enough to show the ankle, and with the Spanish mantilla not to give the incredible pieces of intelligence; but here is the after-dinner story of Crinoline is always good to entertain society.

The latest mode, however, adopted by the ladies at Compiegne, and for any thing the writer knows, in the Tuileries as well, is to go in for the Arab costume. We have remarked these elegant inventions exposed in the windows of the principal shops, and have heard that the ladies of the court have already adopted the Arab dress in black, straw-colored, or check cloth, are lined interiorly with silk of a contrasting color, and are worn generally in form, and are intended to embrace hermetically from the neck to the feet, and to cover the head with the capuchin and buntresses of Compiegne. The hoods will certainly be found very convenient, and Miss Harriet Hosmer says that ornate in a piece now the vogue at the Palais Royal is to be seen in the streets to-day in Paris, especially in a tall, grand, dazzling meagre personages, whom he is sure to be found in the act to take her to dinner. Even, "oh, Amelia!" exclaims the species; 'pronounce when the hoods are worn, it will be quite the thing to wear Bavol, in coloschemi,' such exhilarates for American." Oh, what a fib is the country of nations!"

THE NEW CONGRESS.

A dispatch dated Paris, 30th ult., says:

"No formal invitation to take part in the Congress, which is to be held on the 10th of December, has yet been sent by France to England: but Count Persigny, the French Ambassador, has had confidential interviews with Lord John Russell. The formal and official invitation will be sent to-morrow from the Austrian Governor and Paris simultaneously. The invitations will be sent to Russia, Prussia, and Austria from Paris, and to England from Vienna. France will abstain from inviting any power, but will leave the question entirely to the Congress itself. It is said, has protested against the nomination of a Regent by Piedmont, as such a Regent would be a member of the Congress. The Pope has already signed at Zurich. It is stated that England also has made representations against the Regency.

ITALY.

PRINCE CARIGNAN DECLINES THE REGENCY.

Prince Carignan has declined the Regency tendered by the Duke of Modena. The Paris Constitutionnel of Gazette thus announces the proceedings in the matter:

"The Count Cavour has gone yesterday to the Duke Chevalier Ringhetti and Chevalier Pervari who had been sent to Turin by the Duke of Modena, the Duke of Parma, and the Provisional Assemblies of Parma, Modena, the Romagna, and Tuscany.

"The Count Cavour, in reply said, 'I am deeply sensible of your offer, and tender my thanks to the Assemblies and to the Princes who have sent you to me, as a mark of the proof of their confidence. I believe that in making this offer you are interpreting the true personal sentiments of your devotedness toward the King, and by your feelings, you are also expressing the wishes of Europe for the order and respect for monarchical institutions. Weighty reasons of political propriety and the approaching Congress deter me, much to my regret, from responding to your appeal, and accepting the charge offered me. This refusal rests on my part, and the sacrifice I am thus making is the more painful to me, as the interests of our common country than if I had acted otherwise. Nevertheless, I thought to do an act of service to Piedmont.' The Chevalier Ringhetti spoke in the person who ought to be entrusted with the Regency of Central Italy. Return my thanks to the Assemblies, and to the Princes, and by your perseverance and their general conduct deserve the sympathies of Europe. Tell them to reckon always on the King, who will support their wishes, and who will never abandon those who intrust their destinies to his loyalty."

WHO IS TO BE REGENT?

Prince Carignan has summoned Chevalier Buoncompagni to undertake the Regency, who at first intimated his readiness to accept the honor and responsibility of the Regency, but on further consideration the Chevalier Buoncompagni had suggested the name for Central Italy to assume the Regency, and the Count Cavour had suggested the Count Boncompagni, which proposal, and had met such disapprobation to the Sardinian Government. The Turin journals are unanimous in declaring that the King of Sardinia can not recede from his act.

SPAIN.

THE WAR WITH MOROCCO.

Marshal O'Donnell had returned to Ceuta, after having effected a survey of the coast of Africa. Military operations were to commence immediately.

The protest of the Moorish Government against the conduct of Spain, declaring war, is published. It assumes that the demands of Spain, in each instance, upon being complied with, the Moorish Government demanded and also, Morocco positive that the King of Sardinia can not recede from his act.

THE WOMAN IN WHITE.

By WILKIE COLLINS.

AUTHOR OF "THE DEAD SECRET," "AFTER DARK," ETC.

HARTRIGHT'S NARRATIVE—Continued.

VII.

WHEN I entered the room, I found Miss Halcombe and an elderly lady seated at the luncheon-table.

The elderly lady, when I was presented to her, proved to be Mrs. Vesey Fairlie's governess, Mrs. Vesey, who had been briefly described to me by Miss Halcombe as a "dear old soul." Miss Halcombe, as possessed of "all the cardinal virtues, and counting for nothing." I can do little more than offer my humble testimony to the truthfulness of Miss Halcombe's sketch of the old lady's character. Mrs. Vesey looked the personification of human composure and female amiability. A calm unpurport of a calm existence beamed in divery soft wrinkle on her placid face. Some of us rush through life; and some of us saunter through it. Mrs. Vesey went through life. Set in the house, early and late; sat in the garden; sat in unexpected window-seats in passages; and in the course of the few days I was destined to take her out walking; sat before the looked at any thing, before she talked of any thing, before she answered, Yes, or No, to the commonest question—always with the same serene smile on her placid lips, the same vacant abstinence turn of her head, the same snugly, comfortable position of her hands and arms, and the same coy possible change of domestic circumstances. A mild, a compliant, an unutterably tranquil and harmless old lady! Even the few words of chance suggested the idea that she had been actually alive since the hour of her birth. She had no much to do in this world, and is engaged in concerning such a vast variety of coexistent professions, that she must surely be dead and then too diurnal and confused to distinguish between one different processes in carrying on at the same time. Starting from this point of view, it will always remain my private persuasion that Mrs. Vesey's knitting and her packing cages when Mrs. Vesey was born, and that the social lady suffered the consequences of premature preoccupation in the mind of the Mother of us all.

"Now, Mrs. Vesey," said Miss Halcombe, looking brighter, sharper, and readier than ever, as contrasted with the contemplative old lady at her side, "what will you have? A cutlet?"

Mrs. Vesey crossed her dimpled hands on the edge of the table, and pleaded; and said, "Yes, dear?"

"What is that, opposite Mr. Hartright? Boiled chicken, is it not? I thought you liked boiled chicken better than cutlet, Mrs. Vesey?"

Mrs. Vesey crossed her dimpled hands off the edge of the table and crossed them on her lap instead; nodded and complainately at the boiled chicken, and said, "Yes, dear."

"Well, but which will you have, to-day? Shall Mr. Hartright give you a cutlet, or shall I? I shall give you some cutlet?"

Mrs. Vesey put one of her dimpled hands back again on the edge of the table; hesitated drowsily; and said, "Which you please, dear."

"Now, Mrs. Vesey!" Her dimpled hands off the edge of the table and crossed them on her lap instead; nodded and complainately at the boiled chicken, and said, "Yes, dear."

"Well, but which will you have, to-day? Shall Mr. Hartright give you a cutlet, or shall I? I shall give you some cutlet?"

Mrs. Vesey put one of her dimpled hand back again on the edge of the table; brightened dimly, one moment; went out again, the next; bowed obediently; and said, "Which you please, dear."

Surely a mild, a compliant, an unutterably tranquil old harmless old lady! Just enough, perhaps, for the present, of Mrs. Vesey.

All this time there were no signs of Miss Fairlie. We finished our luncheon; and still the young lady did not appear. Miss Halcombe quick eye nothing escaped, noticed the looks that I cast, from time to time, in the direction of the door.

"I understand you, Mr. Hartright," she said; "you are wondering why we have not seen more of your pupil. She has been down stairs, and has got over her headache; but has not sufficiently recovered her appetite to join us at lunch. If you will put yourself under my charge, I think I can undertake to find her somewhere in the garden."

She took up a parasol, lying on a chair near her, and led the way out, by a long window at the bottom of the room, which opened on to the lawn. It is almost unnecessary to say that my left Mrs. Vesey still seated at the table, with her dimpled hands still crossed on the edge of it; apparently settled in that position for the rest of the afternoon.

As we crossed the lawn, Miss Halcombe looked at me significantly, and shook her head.

"That unpunctual adventurer of yours," she said, "still remains involved in its own appropriate midnight darkness. I have been all the morning looking over my mother's letters; and I have made no discoveries yet. However, don't despair, Mr. Hartright. I am a true hunter of curiosity; and you have got a woman for your ally. Under such conditions, success is certain, sooner or later. The letters are not exhausted. I have three packets still left, and you may count on giving me my spending the whole evening over them."

Here, then, was one of my anticipations of the morning still unfulfilled. I began, as before, next, whether my introduction to Miss Fairlie would disappoint the expectations that I had been forming of her since breakfast-time.

"And how did you get on with my uncle?" inquired Miss Halcombe, as we left the lawn and turned into a shrubbery. "Was he particularly nervous this morning? Never mind considering about your answer, Mr. Hartright. The mere fact of your being obliged to consider is enough for me. I see in your face that he was particularly nervous, and I am quite quietly unwilling to throw you into the same condition, I ask no more."

We turned off into a winding path while she was speaking, and approached a pretty summer-house, built in Swiss taste, which, in imitation Swiss chalet. The one room of the summer-house, as we ascended the steps at the door, was occupied by a young lady. She was standing near a rustic table, looking out at the inland view of corn and hill-pastures, that gap in the trees, and absently turning over the leaves of a little sketch-book that lay at her side. This was Miss Fairlie.

How can I describe her? How can I separate her from the accessories around her, and from all that has happened in the later time? How can I see her again as she looked when my eyes first rested on her—as she looks now, to the eyes that are about to see her in these pages?

The water-color drawing that I made of Laura Fairlie, at an after-period, in the place and attitude in which I first saw her, lies at my desk while I write. I look at it, and there shows upon me bright, from the dark purple-brown background of the summer-house, a light, youthful figure, clothed in a simple muslin dress, the pattern of it formed by small, separate stripes of delicate blue and white. A scarf of the same material is worn over the closely round her shoulders, and a little straw hat, of the natural color, plainly and sparingly trimmed with ribbon to match the dress, covers her head, and throws its soft pearly shadow over the upper part of her face. Her eyes look at us faint and pale a brown—not flaxen, and yet almost as light; not golden, and yet almost as glossy—and in keeping with them and them, also the shadow of the hat. It is plainly parted and drawn back over her ears, and the line of it ripples naturally as it crosses her forehead. The eyebrows are rather darker than the hair; and the eyes are of that soft, limpid, expressive blue, so often sung by the poets, so seldom seen in real life. Lovely eyes in color, lovely in the form—large and tender and quietly thoughtful —but beautiful above all things in the clear truthfulness of look that dwells in their inmost depths, and shines through all their changes of expression with the light of a pure and a better world. The charm—most gently and yet most distinctly expressed—which they shed over the whole face, so covers and transfigures it in the natural human blemishes elsewhere, that it is difficult to separate the relative shapes and effects of the other features. It is hard to see that the lower part of the face is too delicately rounded and too small, the chin to be in full and fair proportion with the upper part; that the nose, in escaping the application of a better word, is commonplace, and the mouth, on the hand and cruel in a woman, no matter how attractively perfect it may be), has erred a little in the other extreme, and has taken on the ideal straightness of line; and that the sweet, sensitive lips are colorless in a slight over-contraction, when she smiles, which draws them upward a little as one corner, toward the cheek. It might be possible to note these blemishes in another woman's face, but it is not easy to dwell on them in hers, or, indeed, to be concerned with all that is individual and characteristic in her expression, and so closely does the expression depend for its full play and life on every other feature, on the moving impulse of the eyes.

Deep in the clear blue of her, my patient labor of long and happy days, show me these things? Ah, how few of them are in the dim mechanical sketch that now stands at the side with which I regard it! A fair, delicate girl, in a pretty light dress trifling with the leaves of a sketch-book, while she looks up from it with truthful innocent blue eyes—that is all the drawing can say; all, perhaps, that even the deeper reach of thought and pen can say in their language, either. The remembrance that gives life, light, and form to our shadowy conceptions of beauty, fills a void in our spiritual nature that has remained unknown to us till she appeared. Sympathies that lie too deep for words, too deep almost for thoughts, are touched, at such times, by other charms than those which the senses feel and which the resources of expression can realize. The mystery which underlies the beauty of women is never raised above the reach of all sympathies until it has chained kindred with the deeper mystery in our own souls. Then, and then only, has it passed beyond the narrow region on which light falls, in this world, from the pencil and the pen.

Think of her, as you thought of the first woman who quickened the pulses within you that the rest of her sex had no art to stir. List the kind, candid blue eyes meet yours, as they met mine, with the one matchless look which, for both remember so well. Let her voice speak the music that you once loved best, attuned as sweetly to your ear as to mine. Let her footsteps, as she comes and goes in those pages, be like that other footstep which, to you, has its own heart once beat time. Take her as the visionary nursing of your own fancy, and she will grow upon you, all the more clearly and the lifelong woman she dwells in mine.

Among the visitors who had crowded on me, when my eyes first looked upon her—familiar sensations which we all know, which spring to life at the meeting of our hands, and die away, and renew their bright existence in us few—there was one which I remember, because it is one that seemed strangely inconsistent and unaccountably out of place in Miss Fairlie's presence.

Mingling with what I have already described by the charm of her fair face and head, her evident superiority to the surrounding simplicity of manner, was another impression, which, in a shadowy way, suggested to me the idea of something wanting. At the moment, I could not think something wanting in her; at another, like something wanting in myself. I was bewildered me from understanding her as I ought. The impression was always strongest in the most extraordinary moments, when I looked at her, or, in other words, when I was most conscious of the luminous influence of her beauty. Always at the same time, most troubled by the sense of an incompleteness in myself. Always most conscious of something wanting—something wanting—and where it was, and what it was, I could not find out.

The effect of this curious caprice of fancy (as I thought it then) was felt at a nature to see me by one, from the table, and to the little delicate wandering hand that was still trifling with it. "Surely you have seen enough to thank her in the customary phrases of reply. Observing my hesitation, and no doubt attributing it, naturally enough, to the momentary shyness, on my part, Miss Halcombe took the initiative in the introduction, and finally to usual, into her own hands.

"Look there, Mr. Hartright," she said, pointing to the little sketch on the table, and to the little delicate wandering hand that was still trifling with it, "look there, and be grateful that your model pupil is found at last? The moment she hears that you are in the house, she opens her sketch-book directly. It looks universal Nature straight in the face, and longs for help."

Miss Fairlie laughed with a rendy good humor, which broke out, as brightly as if it had been the first time, at the sight of a new face or lovely face.

"I must not take credit to myself where no credit is due," she said; her clear, truthful blue eyes looking alternately at Miss Halcombe and me, as we took our places, as if desirous to be conscious of my own ignorance that I am more in the dark than herself. "I know you are here, Mr. Hartright, I find myself looking over my sketches, as I used to look over my exercises, when I was a little girl, and I was very sadly afraid that I should turn out not fit to be heard."

She made the confession very prettily and simply, and, with quaint, childish earnestness, drew her sketch-book very close to my own side of the table. Miss Halcombe cut the knot of the little embarrassment, however, in her resolute, downright way.

"Good, bad, or indifferent," she said, "the pupil's sketches must pass through their hard ordeal of the master's judgment—and there's an end of it. Mr. Hartright, you may walk in at the carriage, Laura, and let Mr. Hartright see them, for the first time, without further ceremony. Are you ready for another interruption? If we can only confuse him all through the drive, he will mistake it for the right way to set to work, and Nature as it is not, when he looks down again at your sketch-book, we shall drive down again at the last desperate refuge of paying to compliments, and shall sit through his protestations of admiration in a state of perfectly tranquil unruffled."

"I hope Mr. Hartright will pay me no compliments," said Miss Fairlie, as we all left the summer-house.

"You will venture to inquire why you express that hope?" I asked.

"Because I shall believe all that you say to me," she answered, simply.

In those few words she unconsciously gave me the true measure of her, my patient labor of long and happy days, show me these things? Ah, how few of them are in the dim mechanical sketch that now stands at the side with which I regard it! A fair, delicate girl, in a pretty light dress trifling with the leaves of a sketch-book, while she looks up from it with truthful innocent blue eyes—that is all the drawing can say; all, perhaps, that even the deeper reach of thought and pen can say in their language, either. The remembrance that gives life, light, and form to our shadowy conceptions of beauty, fills a void in our spiritual nature that has remained unknown to us till she appeared. Sympathies that lie too deep for words, too deep almost for thoughts, are touched, at such times, by other charms than those which the senses feel and which the resources of expression can realize. The mystery which underlies the beauty of women is never raised above the reach of all sympathies until it has chained kindred with the deeper mystery in our own souls. Then, and then only, has it passed beyond the narrow region on which light falls, in this world, from the pencil and the pen.

Think of her, as you thought of the first woman who quickened the pulses within you that the rest of her sex had no art to stir. List the kind, candid blue eyes meet yours, as they met mine, with the one matchless look which, for both remember so well. Let her voice speak the music that you once loved best, attuned as sweetly to your ear as to mine. Let her footsteps, as she comes and goes in those pages, be like that other footstep which, to you, has its own heart once beat time. Take her as the visionary nursing of your own fancy, and she will grow upon you, all the more clearly and the lifelong woman she dwells in mine.

Among the visitors who had crowded on me, when my eyes first looked upon her—familiar sensations which we all know, which spring to life at the meeting of our hands, and die away, and renew their bright existence in us few—there was one which I remember, because it is one that seemed strangely inconsistent and unaccountably out of place in Miss Fairlie's presence.

Mingling with what I have already described by the charm of her fair face and head, her evident superiority to the surrounding simplicity of manner, was another impression, which, in a shadowy way, suggested to me the idea of something wanting. At the moment, I could not think something wanting in her; at another, like something wanting in myself. I was bewildered me from understanding her as I ought. The impression was always strongest in the most extraordinary moments, when I looked at her, or, in other words, when I was most conscious of the luminous influence of her beauty. Always at the same time, most troubled by the sense of an incompleteness in myself. Always most conscious of something wanting—something wanting—and where it was, and what it was, I could not find out.

The effect of this curious caprice of fancy (as I thought it then) was felt at a nature to see me by one, from the table, and to the little delicate wandering hand that was still trifling with it. "Surely you have seen enough to thank her in the customary phrases of reply. Observing my hesitation, and no doubt attributing it, naturally enough, to the momentary shyness, on my part, Miss Halcombe took the initiative in the introduction, and finally to usual, into her own hands.

"Look there, Mr. Hartright," she said, pointing to the little sketch on the table, and to the little delicate wandering hand that was still trifling with it, "look there, and be grateful that your model pupil is found at last? The moment she hears that you are in the house, she opens her sketch-book directly. It looks universal Nature straight in the face, and longs for help."

Miss Fairlie laughed with a ready good humor, which broke out, as brightly as if it had been the first time, at the sight of a new face or lovely face.

"I must not take credit to myself where no credit is due," she said; her clear, truthful blue eyes looking alternately at Miss Halcombe and me, as we took our places, as if desirous to be conscious of my own ignorance that I am more in the dark than herself. "I know you are here, Mr. Hartright, I find myself looking over my sketches, as I used to look over my exercises, when I was a little girl, and I was very sadly afraid that I should turn out not fit to be heard."

She made the confession very prettily and simply, and, with quaint, childish earnestness, drew her sketch-book very close to my own side of the table. Miss Halcombe cut the knot of the little embarrassment, however, in her resolute, downright way.

"Good, bad, or indifferent," she said, "the pupil's sketches must pass through their hard ordeal of the master's judgment—and there's an end of it. Mr. Hartright, you may walk in at the carriage, Laura, and let Mr. Hartright see them, for the first time, without further ceremony. Are you ready for another interruption? If we can only confuse him all through the drive, he will mistake it for the right way to set to work, and Nature as it is not, when he looks down again at your sketch-book, we shall drive down again at the last desperate refuge of paying to compliments, and shall sit through his protestations of admiration in a state of perfectly tranquil unruffled."

"I hope Mr. Hartright will pay me no compliments," said Miss Fairlie, as we all left the summer-house.

"You will venture to inquire why you express that hope?" I asked.

"Because I shall believe all that you say to me," she answered, simply.

In those few words she unconsciously gave me the true measure of her, my patient labor of long and happy days, show me these things? Ah, how few of them are in the dim mechanical sketch that now stands at the side with which I regard it! A fair, delicate girl, in a pretty light dress trifling with the leaves of a sketch-book, while she looks up from it with truthful innocent blue eyes—that is all the drawing can say; all, perhaps, that even the deeper reach of thought and pen can say in their language, either. The remembrance that gives life, light, and form to our shadowy conceptions of beauty, fills a void in our spiritual nature that has remained unknown to us till she appeared. Sympathies that lie too deep for words, too deep almost for thoughts, are touched, at such times, by other charms than those which the senses feel and which the resources of expression can realize. The mystery which underlies the beauty of women is never raised above the reach of all sympathies until it has chained kindred with the deeper mystery in our own souls. Then, and then only, has it passed beyond the narrow region on which light falls, in this world, from the pencil and the pen.

Yes! let me acknowledge that, on this first day, I let the charm of her presence lure me from the recollection of myself and my position. The most trifling of the questions that she put to me, on the subject of using her pencil and mixing her colors; the slightest alterations of expression in the lovely eyes that looked into mine, with such an earnest desire to learn all that I could teach and to discover all that I could love, attracted more of my attention than the finest view we passed through, or the greatest changes of light and shade, as they flowed into each other, on the waving moorland and the level beach. At any time, and under any circumstances, I am slow to take an interest and to see how little real hold the objects of the natural world amidst which we live can gain on the attention of our hearts. We go to Nature for comfort in trouble, and sympathy in joy, only in books. Among the realities that surround the passionate world, which modern poetry so largely and so eloquently describes, is not, even in these days, the true original instincts of our nature. As children, we none of us possess it. No writers of men or women possess it. Those whose lives are most exclusively passed amidst the ever-changing wonders of sea and sky, are often the most unable and unwilling to express in any aspect of Nature not directly associated with the human interest of their calling. Our capacity of appreciating the beauties of the earth we live on, is, in truth, one of the civilized accomplishments which we all learn, as an Art; and, more, that very capacity is rarely developed in us, or at any rate in our minds are most indolent and most unoccupied. How much time we waste, how much pain Nature can lead in the pleasurable or painful interests and emotions of ourselves or our friends! What spaces do they occupy in the thousand little narratives of personal experience which pass in review over us at month from one or to the other? All that our minds can compass, all that our hearts can learn, can be accomplished with our present, equal profit, and equal satisfaction to ourselves, in the poorest as in the richest prospect that we can find, or can choose. There is surely a reason for this want of inborn sympathy between the creature and the creation—and, if a reason which may perhaps be found in the widely-differing destinies which await the two spheres. The greatest mountain prospect that the eye can range over is appointed to annihilation. The smallest human interest that the pen can trace, is appointed to immortality.

We had been out nearly three hours, when the carriage again passed through the gates of Limmeridge House.

On our return, I had let the ladies settle for themselves the first point of view which they chose to adopt under my instruction, on the afternoon of the next day. When they withdrew to dress for dinner, and when I was alone again in my sitting-room, my spirits seemed to leave me on a sudden. I felt ill at ease and dissatisfied with myself. I knew not why. Perhaps I was now conscious, for the first time, of having enjoyed our drive too much in the pleasure of being idle, and I felt the more when I was first introduced to her, haunted me still. Even if I won a relief to my spirits when the dinner-bell called me out of my solitude, I brought me back to the society of the ladies of the house.

I was struck, on entering the drawing-room, by a new appearance in the room, rather in material than. in color, of the dresses which they now were. While Miss Halcombe and Miss Halcombe were richly clad (each in the manner most becoming to her age), the first in silver-gray, and the second in delicate primrose-yellow color, which matches so well with a dark complexion and black hair, they were both dressed elegantly, and almost poorly dressed in plain white muslin. It was positively pure; it was beautifully clean. It was the sort of dress which the wife or daughter of a poor man might have worn; and in the house of Limmeridge House, so far as externals went, look less affluent in circumstances than I learned to know more of Miss Fairlie's character, I discovered that this contrast was, on the wrong side, was due to her natural delicacy of feeling and natural sincerity of aversion to the slightest personal display of her own wealth. Neither Mrs. Vesey nor Miss Halcombe could ever induce her to dress otherwise in dress denoted the two ladies who were poor, to lean to the side of the one less fortunate than herself.

When dinner was over, we returned together to the drawing-room. Although Mr. Fairlie considered the unfavorable condescension of the monarch who had picked up Titian's brush for him) had permitted his former governess to wishes in relation to the wine that I might prefer after dinner, I was resolute enough to retain my independence, sitting in solitary grandeur among bottles of my own choosing, and seating myself at the ladies' request at one end of the table with them habitually, on the civilized foreign plan, during the period of my residence at Limmeridge House.

The drawing-room, to which we had now withdrawn for the rest of the evening, was on the ground-floor, and was of the same shape and size as the breakfast-room. Large glass doors at the lower end opened on to a terrace, beautifully ornamented along its whole length with a profusion of flowers. The soft, hazy twilight was just shading leaf and blossom alike into harmony with its own sober hues, as we entered the room; and the sweet evening scent of the flowers met us with its fragrant welcome through the open glass doors. Good Mrs. Vesey (always the first of the party to sit down) took possession of an arm-chair in a corner, and closed off comfortably to sleep. At my request, Miss Fairlie ranged herself at the piano. As I followed her to a seat near the instrument, I saw Miss Halcombe retire into a distant recess of the side windows, to proceed with the search through her mother's letters by the last quiet rays of the evening light.

How vividly that peaceful home-picture of the drawing-room comes back to me while I write! From the place where I sat, I could see Miss Fairlie advancing, through the full of the soft light, half in mysterious shadow, bending intently over the music-book on the desk. Nearer to me, the fair profile of the player at the piano was just delicately defined against the luminous background of the open sunset of the room. Outside, on the terrace, the clustering flowers and lone peacock in the prospect waved so gently in the light evening air, that the sound of their rustling never reached us. The repose of the scene, the calm of the evening mystery of moonlight began to tremble already in the region of the western horizon. The scene of peace and seclusion soothed all thought and feeling into a rapt, unearthly respect; and the last touch of that deepened even while the deepening light, seemed to hover over us with a gentler influence still, when there crept upon it from the piano the heavenly tenderness of the music of Mozart. It was an evening of sights and sounds never to forget.

We all sat silent in the places we had chosen, for a little while, still sleeping. Miss Fairlie still playing, Miss Halcombe still reading—till the light failed us. By this time the notes had stolen round to the terrace, and soft, mysterious rays of light were slanting already across the darkness of the room. The change from the twilight obscurity was so beautiful, that we hesitated the lamps, and waited patiently when the servant brought them in; and kept the large room unlighted, except by the glimmer of the candles on the piano.

For half an hour more, the music still went on. After that time, the beauty of the moonlight view on the terrace tempted Miss Fairlie out to look at it; and I followed her. When the ladies rose to leave the room, Miss Halcombe had changed her place, so as to continue her occupation at the table by their hostess. We left her, on a low chair, at one side of the instrument, so absorbed over her letters that she did not notice us when we moved.

We had been out on the terrace together, just in front of the glass doors, hardly so long as five minutes, I should think; and Miss Fairlie had been telling me, with a few of her white handkerchief over her head as a precaution against the night air, that Miss Halcombe's voice—low, eager, and altered from its natural lively tone—pronounce my name.

"Mr. Hartright," she said, "can you come here for a minute? I want to speak to you."

I entered the room again immediately. The piano stood about half-way down along the inner wall. On the side of the instrument farthest from the terrace, Miss Halcombe was sitting with the letters scattered on her lap, and with one of them held open in her hand, and held close to the candle. On the side nearest to the terrace stood a little table, covered with books, near my place. In this position, I was not far from the glass doors; and I could see Miss Fairlie, therefore, as she passed and repassed the opening on to the terrace; walking slowly from end to end of it in the full radiance of the moonlight.

"I want you to listen while I read the contents of these letters to you, Mr. Hartright," Miss Halcombe. "Tell me if you think they throw any light upon the strange subject we started on this garden. The letter is addressed by my mother to her second husband, Mr. Fairlie; and it was written in a period of twenty years and twelve years since. At that time, Mr. and Mrs. Fairlie, and my niece Laura, had been living for years in this house; and I was away from them, completing my education at a school in London.

She looked and spoke earnestly, and as I thought, a little anxiously, at the end of the moment when she raised the letter to the candle before beginning to read it, Miss Fairlie passed the door-way, looked in for a moment, and, seeing that we were engaged, slowly walked on.

Miss Halcombe began to read, as follows:

"You will be tired, my dear Philip, of hearing perpetually about my schools and my schoolboys. Let me assure you, on the contrary, that my life at Limmeridge, and not on me. Besides, this time, I have something really interesting to tell you about a new scholar.

"You know old Mrs. Kempe; at the village here. Well, after years of waiting, the doctor has at last given her up, and she is dying slowly, day by day. Her only child, Jane, a sister, died last week to take care of her. This sister comes all the way from Hampshire—her name is Catherick. Four days ago Mrs. Catherick came here to see me, and brought her only child with her, a sweet little girl, about a year older than our darling Laura—

As the last sentence fell from the reader's lips, Miss Fairlie passed us on the terrace once more. She was softly singing to herself one of the melodies which she had been playing earlier in the evening. Miss Halcombe waited till she had passed out of sight again; and then went on with the letter:

"Mrs. Catherick is a decent, well-behaved, respectable woman; middle aged, and with the remains of having been moderately, only moderately, nice-looking. There is something in her manner and her appearance, however, which I can't make out. She is reserved about herself to the point of downright secrecy, and there is a look in her face—I can't describe it—which suggests to me that she has something on her mind. She is altogether what you would call a walking mystery. Her errand at Limmeridge House, however, was simple enough. When she left Hampshire to nurse her sister, Mrs. Kemp, through her last illness, she had been obliged to bring her daughter with her, through having no one at home to take care of the little girl. Mrs. Kemp may die in a week's time, or may linger on for months; and Mrs. Catherick's object was to ask me to let her daughter, Anne, have the benefit of attending my school; subject to the condition of her being removed from it to go home again with her mother, when Mrs. Kemp's death. I consented at once; and when Laura and I went out for our walk, we took the little girl (who is just eleven years old) to the school, that very day."

Once more, Miss Fairlie's figure, bright and soft in its snowy muslin dress—her face gently framed by the white folds of the handkerchief which she had tied under her chin—appeared to us in the moonlight. Once more, Miss Halcombe waited till she was out of sight; and then went on:

"I have taken a violent fancy, Philip, to my new scholar, for a reason which I mean to keep till the last for the sake of surprising you. Her mother having told me as little about the child as possible, I have found out for myself. I am discover (which I did on the first day when we tried her at lessons) that the poor little thing's intellect is not developed as it ought to be at her age. Seeing this, I had her up to the house the next day, and privately surveyed it with the doctor to come and watch her and question her, and tell me what he thought. His opinion is that she will grow out of it. But he says her careful bringing up at school is a matter of great importance just now, because the unusual slowness in acquiring ideas implies an unusual tenacity in keeping them when they are once received into her mind. Now, my dear, you must not imagine, in your off-hand way, that I have been attaching myself to an idiot. This poor little Anne Catherick is a sweet, affectionate, grateful girl, and says the quaintest, prettiest things (to say that shall judge by an instance) in the most oddly-sudden, surprised, half-frightened way. Although she is dressed in mourning, her clothes show a sad want of taste in color and pattern. So I arranged, yesterday, that some of our darling Laura's old white frocks and white hats should be altered for Anne Catherick, explaining to her that little girls of her complexion looked neater and better all in white than in any thing else. She hesitated and seemed puzzled for a minute, then flushed up, and appeared to understand. Her little hand clasped mine quite warmly. She kissed it, Philip, and said (oh, so earnestly), 'I will always wear white as long as I live. It will help me to remember you, ma'am, and to think that I am pleasing you still, when I go away and see you no more.' This is only one specimen of the quaint things she says so prettily. Poor little soul! She shall have a stock of white frocks, made with good deep tucks, to let out for her as she grows—'"

Miss Halcombe paused, and looked at me across the piano.

"Did the forlorn woman whom you met in the high-road seem young?" she asked. "Young enough to be two or three-and-twenty?"

"Yes, Miss Halcombe, as young as that."

"And also very strangely dressed, from head to foot, all in white?"

"All in white."

While the answer was passing my lips Miss Fairlie glided into view on the terrace for the third time. Instead of proceeding on her walk, she stopped, with her back turned toward us, and, leaning on the balustrade of the terrace, looked down into the garden beyond. My eyes fixed upon the white gleam of her muslin gown and head-dress in the moonlight, and a sensation, for which I can find no name—a sensation that quickened my pulse and raised a fluttering at my heart—began to steal over me.

"I, in return," Miss Halcombe repeated. "The most important sentences in the letter, Mr. Hartright, are those at the end, which I will read to you immediately. But I can't help dwelling a little upon the coincidence of the white costume of the woman you met, and the white frocks which produced that strange answer from my mother's little scholar. The doctor may have been wrong when he discovered the child's defects of intellect, and predicted that she would 'grow out of them.' She has never have grown out of them; and the old grateful fancy about dressing in white, which was a serious feeling to the girl, may be a serious feeling to the woman still."

I said a few words in answer—I hardly know what. All my attention was concentrated on the white figure of Miss Fairlie musing below.

"Listen to the last sentences of the letter," said Miss Halcombe. "I think they will surprise you."

As she raised the letter to the light of the candle, Miss Fairlie turned from the balustrade, looked doubtfully up and down the terrace, advanced a step toward the glass doors, and then stopped, facing us.

Meanwhile, Miss Halcombe read me the last sentences to which she had referred:

"And now, my love, seeing that I am at the end of my paper, now for the real reason, the surprising reason, for my fondness for little Anne Catherick. My dear Philip, although she is not half so pretty, she is, nevertheless, by one of those extraordinary caprices of accidental resemblance which one sometimes sees, the living likeness, in her hair, her complexion, the color of her eyes, and the shape of her face, of—"

I started up from the ottoman before Miss Halcombe could pronounce the next word. A thrill of the same feeling which ran through me when the touch was laid upon my shoulder on the lonely high-road ran through me again.

There stood Miss Fairlie, a white figure, alone in the moonlight; in the complexion, the color of her head, in her complexion, in the shape of her face, the living image, at that distance and under those circumstances, of the woman in white! The doubt which had troubled my mind for days past vanished before the new conviction in an instant. That "something wanting" was the recognition of the unconscious likeness between the fugitive from the asylum and the heiress of Limmeridge House.

"You are pale, Philip," said Miss Halcombe. She dropped the useless letter, and her eyes flashed as they met mine. "I've seen it now, as my mother saw it eleven years since!"

I see it—more unwillingly than I can say. My associations that forlorn, friendless, lost woman, even by an accidental likeness only, with Miss Fairlie, seems like casting a shadow on the future of the bright creature who stood looking at us now. Let me lose the impression again, as soon as possible! Let me see the face of the dreary moonlight—pray call her in!"

"Mr. Hartright, you surprise me. What, ever woman may be, I thought that men, in the nineteenth century, were above superstition."

"Pray call her in!"

"Hush, hush! Sara is coming of her own accord. Say nothing in her presence. Let this discovery of the likeness be kept a secret between you and me. Come in, Sara, come in, and wake Mrs. Vesey with the piano. Mr. Hartright is continuing for some more music, and he wants it, this time, of the lightest and liveliest kind."

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1860, by Harper & Brothers, in the Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

TRUMPS.

BY GEORGE WILLIAM CURTIS.

CHAPTER LXXXII.

IN VINO VERITAS.

The Honorable Abel Newt was elected to Congress in place of the Honorable Watkins Bodley, who withdrew on account of the embarrassment of his private affairs. At the public meeting of the General Committee Mr. Enos Slugby, Chairman of the Ward Committee, introduced a long and eloquent resolution, deploring the loss sustained by the city and by the whole country in the resignation of the Honorable Watkins Bodley—sympathizing with him in the pecuniary and private affairs—but rejoicing that the word "close up" was always faithfully observed, that there was always a fresh soldier to fill the place of the retiring—and that the Party never summoned her sons in vain.

General Belch then rose and offered a resolution:

"Resolved—That in the Honorable Abel Newt, our representative, just elected by a triumphant majority of the votes of the enlightened and independent voters of the district—a constituency of whose favor the most experienced and illustrious statesman might be proud—we recognize a worthy exemplar of the purest republican virtues, a consistent enemy of a purse-proud aristocracy, the equally unflinching friend of the people; a man who dedicates with enthusiasm the rare powers of his youth, his scholarship, and his profoundest and sincerest convictions, to the great cause of popular rights of which the Party is the exponent.

"Resolved—That the Honorable Abel Newt be requested, at the earliest possible moment, to unfold to his fellow-citizens his views upon the State and National political affairs."

"SHE WAS STANDING NEAR A RUSTIC TABLE—"

Mr. William Condor spoke feelingly in support of the resolutions.

"Fellow-citizens," he said, eloquently, in conclusion, "if there is one thing sobler than another, it is an upright, downright, disinterested, honest man; and such I am proud and happy to declare my friend, your friend, the friend of all honest men, to be; and I call for three cheers for Honest Abel Newt!"

They were given with ardor; and then General Belch was called out for a few remarks, "which he delivered," said the Evening Banner of the Union, "with his accustomed humor, keeping the audience in a roar of laughter, and sending every body happy to bed."

The Committee-meeting was over, and the spectators retired to the neighboring bar-room. Mr. Slugby, Mr. Condor, and General Belch tarried behind, with two or three more.

"Shall we go to Newt's?" asked the General.

"Yes, I told him we should be round after the meeting," replied Mr. Condor; and the party were presently at his rooms.

The Honorable Abel had placed several full decanters upon the table, with a box of cigars.

"Newt, how come you make that speech?" inquired General Belch, after they had been smoking and drinking for some time.

"Whenever you please," answered Abel. "I am primed."

"Well, take care that you're not primed when you deliver it," said the General. "We've had enough of that."

There was a loud laugh. Perhaps there was never less merriment in laughter.

"You may talk about every thing but the Grant," said Slugby; "but you must only allude to that under the general head of national grandeur and generosity—and—and—"

"And dividends," interpolated Abel.

There was another laugh.

"Mr. Newt," said Enos Slugby.

Abel turned his head.

"You have an uncle, have you not?" Abel nodded.

"A very prominent merchant, I believe. His name is very well known, and he commands great respect. Ahem!"

Mr. Slugby cleared his throat; then continued:

"He will naturally be very much interested in the career and success of his nephew."

"Oh, immensely!" replied Abel, in a thick voice, and with a look and tone which suggested to his friends that he was rapidly priming himself. "I'm immensely enormously!"

"Ah, yes," said Mr. Slugby, with an air of serious meditation. "I do not remember to have heard the character of his political proclivities mentioned. But, of course, as the brother of Senator Newt, and the uncle of the Honorable Abel Newt"—here Mr. Slugby bowed to that gentleman, who winked at him over the rim of his glass—"he is naturally a friend of the people."

"Yes," returned Abel.

"I think you said he was very fond of you?" added Mr. Slugby, while his friends looked expectantly on.

"Fond? It's a clear case of apple of the eye," answered Abel, reddening.

"Very good," said William Condor; "very good indeed."

"Capital!" laughed Belch; and whispered to his neighbor Condor, "In vino veritas."

As they whispered and smiled and nodded together, Abel Newt glanced around the circle with sullen, fiery eyes.

"Uncle Lawrence is worth a million of dollars," said he, carelessly.

The group of political gentlemen shook their heads in silent admiration. They seemed tothemselves to have struck a golden vein, and General Belch could not help inwardly complimenting himself upon his profound sagacity in having put forward a candidate who had a bachelor uncle who dotted upon him, and who was worth a million. He perceived at once his own increased importance in the party. To have displaced Watkins Bodley—who was not only an uncertain party implement, but poor—for an unblemishing young man of great ability and of enormous prospects, he knew was to have secured for himself whatever he chose to ask. The fat nose reddened and glistened as if it would burst with triumph and joy. General Arculurius Belch was satisfied.

"Of course," said William Condor, "a man of Mr. Lawrence Newt's experience and knowledge of the world is aware that there are certain necessary expenses attendant upon elections—such as printing, rent, lighting, warming, posting, etc."

"In fact, sundries," said Abel, smiling with the back eye.

"Yes, precisely; sundries," answered Mr. Condor, "which sometimes swell to quite an inordinate figure. Your uncle, I presume, Mr. Newt, would not be unwilling to contribute a certain share of the expense of your election; and indeed, now that you are so considerable a leader, he would probably expect to contribute handsomely to the various expenses of the party. Isn't it so?"

"Of course," said General Belch.

"Of course," said Enos Slugby.

"Of course," echoed the two or three other gentlemen who sat silently, assiduously smoking and drinking.

With a half-maudlin grin he looked along the line.

"By-the-by, Condor, how much do you give a year?"

There was a moment's silence.

"Hit, by G—!" energetically said one of the silent men.

"Good for Newt!" cried General Belch, thumping the table.

There was another little burst of laughter, with the least possible merriment in it. William Condor joined with an entirely unruffled face.

"As for Belch," continued Abel, with what would be called in animals an ugly expression, "Belch is the down, and I'm the cliff easy. The Party is like the old kings, it keeps a good many fools to make it laugh."

He rose very unsteadily, and nobody laughed. General Belch looked as if he were restraining himself from knocking his friend down. But they all saw that he was mastered by the liquor.

"Squeeze Lawrence Newt, will you? Why, Lord, gentlemen, what do you suppose he thinks of you—I mean, of fellows like you?"

He paused, and glared around him. William Condor daintily knocked off the ash of his cigar with the tip of his little finger, and said, calmly,

"I am sure I don't know."

"Nor care," said General Belch.

"He thinks you're all a set of white-livered sneaks!" shouted Abel, in a voice harsh and hoarse with liquor.

The gentlemen were silent. The leaders wagged their feet nervously; the others looked rather amused.

"No offense," resumed Abel. "I don't mean he despises you in particular, but all bar-room bobtails."

MR. NEWT'S WEAK SPOT.

His voice thickened rapidly.

"Of all mess, mis-mis-rabble hounds, he thanks you me the dir-est."

Still no reply was made. The honorable gentleman looked at his guests lovingly, but found no responsive glance.

"In whoo veritas," whispered Condor to his neighbor Slagby. William Condor was always clean in linen and calm in manner.

"Don't be 'formed, fel-fel-low cit-zens! He's no friend of mine. I guess his G— d— avide'll get a tumble some day; by G— I do!" Abel added, with a furrow his, as if some malignant snake spoke its hate.

The guests looked relieved as they heard the last words. Abel ceased, and passed the decanter, which they did not decline; for they all felt as if the honorable Abel Newt would probably throw it at the head of any man who said or did what he did not approve. There was a low, anxious murmur of conversation among them until Abel was evidently very intoxicated, and his head sank upon his breast.

"I'm terribly afraid we've burned our fingers," said Mr. Reuss Slagby, looking a little ruefully at the honorable representative.

"Oh, I hope not," said General Belch; "but there may be some breakers ahead. If we lose the Grant it won't be the first cause or man that has been betrayed by the Border States. But we fill your glass. It is clear that if our dear friend Newt has a weakness it is the bottle; and if our enemies at Washington, who now have him off this grant, have a strength, it is finding out an adversary's soft spot. We must avoid the increase that it's dangerous playing with edged tools. But I've great faith in his want of principle. We can show him so clearly that his interests, his advance, his career depend so entirely upon his constancy, that I think we can keep him straight. And, for my part, if we can only work this grant through, I shall retire upon my share of the proceeds, and leave others to throw who love 'em. But I don't mean to have worked for nothing—eh, Condor?"

"Amen," replied William, placidly.

"By-the-by, Condor," said Mr. Enos Slagby, Mr. Condor turned toward him inquiringly.

"I heard Jim say, t'other day—"

"Who's Jim?" asked Condor.

"Jim!" returned Slagby, "Jim—why, Jim's the party in my district."

"Oh yes—yes: I beg pardon," said Condor; "the name had escaped me."

"Well, I heard Jim say, t'other day, that Mr. William Condor was getting 'too d—d stuck up,' and that he'd yank him out of it first fair he'd he didn't mind his eye. That's you, Condor; so I advise you to look out. It's easy enough to manage Jim, if you take care. He'll go as gently as a well-broke filly; but if he once takes a lurch—if he thinks you're too 'proud or 'big,' it's all up with you. So mind how you treat Jim."

"Well, well," said Belch, impatiently; "we've other business on hand now."

"Exactly," said Condor; "we are the Honorable Abel's Jim. Turn about is fair play. Jim makes us go: we make Abel go. It's a lovely series of checks and balances."

He said it so quietly and airily that they all laughed. Then the General addressed him:

"We're going to send Newt to look after Ele, and I rather think we shall have to send somebody to look after Newt. However, we'll see. Let's leave this bog to snore by himself."

They rose as he spoke.

"What were the words of your resolution, Belch?" asked William Condor, with his eyes twinkling. "I don't quite remember. Did you say," he added, looking at Abel, who lay bedshed, dead drunk, in his chair, "that he decidated his profoundest and sincerest, or sincerest and profoundest convictions?"

"And you, Condor," said Enos Slagby, smiling, as he lighted a fresh cigar, "did you say that you were proud and happy, or happy and proud, to call him your friend?"

"Lord! Lord! what an old bum it is—isn't it?" said General Belch, cheerfully, as he smoothed his hat with his coat-sleeve, and put it on.

They went down stairs laughing and chatting, and the Honorable Abel Newt, the worthy exemplar of the purest republicanism—as the resolution stated when it appeared in the next morning's papers—was left snoring amidst his constituency of empty decanters and drained glasses.

CHAPTER LXXXIII.

FACE TO FACE.

LAWRENCE NEWT now knew that there was no longer any cloud between him and Hope Wayne. That uncertainty, that hesitation, that misdirected pride and doubt, which had prevented his speaking or acting as if he knew of any feeling toward him upon her part that might not be that of a faithful friend only, were all gone now, although he had not seen her. The morning—it was but a few days ago—in which he had spoken with Mrs. Simcoe seemed already like an old historical epoch. It was remote in time—dim with antiquity; and as he saw her, for the single moment as he passed out, raising the head of golden hair, the deep violet eyes, the thoughtful brow, from the book, and bowing to him with the clear, smiling blue eyes, so he knew he should see her forever—he knew that it was as if that moment she had been made immortal in youth, in goodness, in beauty.

And as he stood alone at the office window over the busy street, musing of those things, the sadness which had always mingled with the inscrutable look in his eyes faded, and he was conscious that he loved Hope Wayne as her oldest, dearest friend might love her—as the friend where life and destiny had met so deeply interwrought with hers had a right to love her; and she stood sacred before his mind, sacred and dear.

He had not been to her house since that morning. Business engagements, he had said to Mrs. Simcoe, that the first meeting would be at Amy Wentley's, after he had arrived on that evening the Round Table would meet.

There was a stir beside him, and he looked suddenly round upon the clerk.

"Signor Pittore! what brings a bird into the barn-yard?"

"The hope of some crumb of comfort."

"Do you dip from your empyrean to the cold earth—from the clouds to counting-house—to find comfort?" asked Lawrence Newt, cheerfully.

Arthur Merlin looked only half sympathetic with his friend's gayety. There was a wan air on his face, and a sorrow in his eyes, which touched Lawrence.

"Why, Arthur, what is it?"

"Do you remember what Diana said—I am sure that that silly shepherd will not sleep there forever. Have you heard from her? Diana never looks or loves for nothing?"

Lawrence Newt gazed at him without speaking.

"Come, you have correspondence all over the world. What is the news from Italy? Has the silly shepherd woked up?" said Arthur, in a little shrill effort to be gay.

"My dear Arthur," said Mr. Newt, gravely, "I told you long ago that he was dead to all but heavenly memories."

The two men gazed steadfastly at each other without speaking. At length Arthur said, in a low voice,

"Dead?"

"Dead."

As Lawrence Newt spoke the word the air of the old sailor song which he was singing with that pervasive murmur, sad, soft, infinitely tender, "Good-by, Mr. Newt, good-by!"

But his eye was cold and his face cheerful.

"Arthur, sit down."

The young man seated himself, and the older one drawing a chair to the window, they sat with their backs to the outer office, and looking upon the street.

"I am older than you, Arthur, and I am your friend. What I am going to say to you I have no right to say, except in your entire friendship."

The young man's eyes glistened.

"Go on," he said.

"When I first knew you I know that you loved Hope Wayne."

A flush deepened upon Arthur's face, and his fingers played idly upon the arm of the chair.

"I hoped that Hope Wayne would love you. I was sure that she would. It never occurred to me that she could—could—"

Arthur turned and looked at him.

"Could love any body else," said Lawrence Newt, as his eyes wandered dreamily among the vessels, as if the canvas were the page on which his memory sailed far away.

Suddenly, without the least suspicion on my part, I discovered that she did love somebody else."

"Yes," said Arthur, "so did I."

"What could I do?" said the other, still abstractedly gazing; "for I loved her."

"You loved her?" cried Arthur Merlin, so suddenly and loud that Thomas Tray looked up from his desert red Russia leather, and shook his head toward the inner office.

"Certainly I loved her," replied Lawrence Newt, calmly and with tender sweetness; "and I had a right to, for I loved her mother. Could I have had my way Hope Wayne's mother would have been my wife."

Arthur Merlin stole a glance at the face of of his companion.

"I was a child and she was a child—a boy and a girl. It was not to be. She married another man and died; but her memory is forever sacred to me, and so is her daughter."

To this astonishing revelation Arthur Merlin said nothing. His fingers still played idly on the chair, and his eyes, like the eyes of Lawrence, looked out upon the river. Every thing in Lawrence Newt's conduct was at once explained; and the poor artist was ready to curse his absurd folly in making his friend involuntarily sit for Diana. Lawrence Newt knew his friend's thoughts.

"Arthur," he said, in a low voice, "did I not say that if Endymion were not dead that I would be impossible not to awake and love him? Do you not see that I was dead to her?"

"But does she know it?" asked the painter.

"I believe she does now," was the slow answer. "But she does not know it long."

"Does Amy Waring know it?"

"Yes," replied Lawrence Newt, quietly, "but she will to-night."

The two men sat silently together for some time. The junior partner came in, spoke to Arthur, wrote a little, and went out again. Thomas Tray glanced up occasionally from his great volume, and the melancholy eyes of Lit. Malaccus everywhere turned from the tea-pot urn which he watched from his desk through the office windows. Venables was promoted to the position of Thomas Tray on the very day that Gabriel was admitted a junior partner. They were all aware that the head of the house was engaged in some deeply interesting conversation, and they learned from Little Malaccus who the stranger was.

The two men sat silently together, Lawrence Newt evidently musing of Diana, and Arthur Merlin vainly trying to say something further.

"I wonder—" he began, at length, and stopped. A sad expression of doubt clouded his face; but Lawrence turned to him cheerfully, and, in a frank, assuring tone,

"Arthur, speak out."

"Well," said the artist, with almost a girl's shyness showing his whole manner, "I reckon you, at least, I can speak, and am not ashamed, to want to know whether—you think—"

He spoke very slowly, and stopped again. Before he resumed he saw Lawrence Newt shake his head gently.

"Why, what?" asked Arthur, quickly.

"I do not think she does, dear will," replied the other, as if the artist had asked a question with his eyes. He spoke in a very low, serious tone.

"Will not!" said Arthur, his face beaming with a bright crimson flush.

Lawrence Newt waited a moment, to give his friend time to recover, before he said,

"Shall I say what?"

Arthur sat silent for a little while; then he said, sadly,

"No, it is no matter."

He seemed to have grown older as he sat looking from the window. His hands idly played on them, but rested quietly upon the chair. He shook his head slowly, and repeated, in a tone which touched his friend to the heart,

"No—no—it's no matter."

"But, Arthur, it's only my opinion," said the other, kindly.

"And must, too," replied the artist, with an inexpressible sadness.

Lawrence Newt was silent. After a few moments Arthur Merlin rose and shook his hand.

"Good-by!" he said. "We shall meet to-night."

Lawrence Newt held the young man's hand. His heart was full of sympathy and regret. Amy Waring and he had so often spoken of Arthur and Hope as sure finally to love each other, that now it came to count upon it as something that had already happened; and as he now held the young man's hand, and looked into his kind, sincere eyes, he felt a peculiar affection for him—remembering that as to himself he had loved Hope's mother, and vainly, so Arthur loved the daughter, and equally, though for very different reasons.

"God bless you, Arthur!"

They shook hands once more, and the painter was gone.

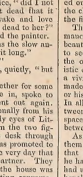
CHAP. LXXXIV.

FINISHING PICTURES.

ARTHUR MERLIN returned to his studio, and carefully locked the door. Then he opened a huge portfolio, which was full of sketches—and they were all of the same subject, treated in a hundred ways—they were all Hope Wayne.

Sometimes it was a lady leaning from an oriel window in a medieval tower, listening in the moonlight, with love in her eyes and attitude, to the music of a guitar, touched by a gallant knight below, who looked as Arthur Merlin would have looked had Arthur Merlin been a gallant mediæval knight.

Then it was Juliet, pale and unconscious



THE SOLITARY GRAVE ON THE HILL-TOP.

in the tomb; superb in snow-white drapery; pure as an angel, lovely as a woman; but it was Hope Wayne still—and Romeo stole frightened in, but Romeo was Arthur.

Or it was Beatrice moving in a radiant heaven; while far below, kneeling, and with clasped hands, gazing upward, the melancholy Dante watched the vision.

Or the fair phantom of Goethe's ballad looked out with humid passionate glances between the clustering reeds she parted aside, and lured the fisherman with love.

There were scores of such sketches, from romance, and history, and fancy, and in each the beauty was Hope Wayne's; and it was strange to see that in each, however different from all the others, there was still a charm character-istic of the woman he loved; so that it seemed a vivid record of all the impressions she had made upon him, and as if all heroines of poetry or history were only ladies in waiting upon her. In all of them, too, there was a separation between them. She was remote in sphere or in space; there was the feeling of inaccessibility between them in all.

At last Arthur rose slowly over, and gazed at them as constantly as if his glance could make that beauty live, as suddenly perceived, who he had never before felt, that the instinct which had unconsciously given the same character of hopelessness to the incident of the sketches, was the same that had made him so readily acquiesce in what Lawrence Newt had hinted. He passed at a drawing of Pygmalion and his statue. The same instinct had selected the moment before the sculptor's prayer was granted, when he looks at the immovable beauty of his statue with the yearning love that made the marble live. But the statue of Arthur's Pygmalion would never live. It was a statue only, and forever. He asked himself why he had not selected the moment when she falls breathing and blushing into the sculptor's arms.

Alone in his studio the artist blushed, as if the very thought were wrong; and he felt that he had never really dared to hope, however he had longed and wished and fluttered his fancy.

He looked at each one of the drawings carefully and long; then kissed it, and turned it upon its face. When he had more than all he sat for a moment; then quietly tore them into long strips, then into small pieces; and lifting the window, scattered them upon the air. The wind whirled them over the street.

"Oh, what a pretty snow-storm!" said the little street children looking up.

Then Arthur Merlin turned to his great easel, upon which stood the canvas of the picture of Diana and Endymion. Through the parted clouds the face of the Queen and Huntress—the face of Hope Wayne—looked tenderly upon the sleeping figure of the shepherd on the bare top of the grassy hill—the face and form of Lawrence Newt.

The painter took his brushes and his pallet, and his maul-stick. He paused for some time again, as he stood before the easel, then he went quietly to work. He toiled in here and there. He stepped back to mark the effect—rubbed with his fingers—sighed—frowned hard—and still worked on. The hours glided away, and daylight began to fade, but not until he had finished his work.

Then he scraped his pallet and washed his brushes, and seated himself upon the sofa opposite the easel. There was no picture of Diana or of Endymion any longer. In the place of Diana there was a full summer moon shining calmly in a cloudless heaven. Its benignant light fell upon a solitary grave upon a hill-top, which filled the spot where Endymion had lain.

Arthur Merlin sat in the corner of the sofa with folded arms, looking at the picture, until the darkness entirely hid it from view.

Bronchial Complaints, &c.

Rev. D. F. Lycoming, Editor of the Christian Advocate, says of Brown's Bronchial Troches: "We have frequently had occasion to test the efficacy of Brown's Bronchial Troches, and have invariably found them to answer the purpose for which they are recommended. From our own personal experience and observation, we know them to be a superior remedy for colds, coughs, and bronchial complaints."

Note.—We publish the above statement as evidence unwitting, because we have confidence in the Troches, having tried them, frequently, and always with success.—Tribune and Christian Herald.

JONAS WHITCOMB'S REMEDY FOR ASTHMA

Is worthy the attention of all who suffer from this distressing complaint. The late JONAS WHITCOMB, of Boston, visited Europe a few years since for the benefit of his health, which was much impaired by frequent attacks of Spasmodic Asthma.

While in Germany, an eminent physician became interested in his case, and promised him relief. He followed the treatment ordered, and, to his surprise and joy, his asthma almost entirely disappeared. He procured the recipe which had accomplished so much for him, brought it with him to this country, and in a short time in a year also was brought to the very gates of death, requiring two or three nurses, sometimes for several days and nights in succession. At one time she was so far gone that her physician could not count her pulse. I consulted numerous physicians of the highest celebrity, to little or no purpose. At length I heard of "Whitcomb's Remedy," I acted like a charm: it enabled her to sleep quietly in a few minutes, and nearly broke up the disease. I am a Methodist Clergyman, stationed here. I shall be happy to answer any letter requiring her card.

Yours truly, KIMBALL HADLEY.

Prepared by JOSEPH BURNETT & CO., Boston, and sold by all Druggists.

One Dollar per Bottle.

COCIN! COCIN! COCIN!

PHALON & SON'S

C O C I N !

THE ONLY GENUINE ARTICLE MADE FROM

COCOA-NUT OIL.

For Promoting the Growth of the Hair.

This valuable preparation is rapidly taking the place of every article now in use. It imparts to the hair its natural color and brilliancy. One trial will satisfy all those who have used any other preparation.

Phalon's Cocoa
Promotes the Growth of the Hair.

Phalon's Cocoa
Prevents the Hair Falling Off.

Phalon's Cocoa
Kills and Removes Dandruff.

Phalon's Cocoa
Gives New Life to the Human Hair.

Phalon's Cocoa
Makes the Hair Rich and Glossy.

Phalon's Cocoa
Is the most perfect Dressing for the Hair

Phalon's Cocoa
Leaves no Disagreeable Odor.

Phalon's Cocoa
Leaves no Sticky Substance.

Phalon's Cocoa
Costs 50 cents and $1 a Bottle.

Be sure and ask for PHALON'S COCIN, and see that you get no other, as there are many imitations of this article in the market.

Prepared by
PHALON & SON,
Manufacturers of the Celebrated Cocoa Preparery,
NEW YORK.

To Stewards.—The attention of heads of families is respectfully invited to the superior quality of Burnett's Flavoring Extracts.

They are entirely free from the poisonous oils and acids which enter into the composition of many of the fanciful fruit flavors now in the market. They are highly concentrated, have all the freshness and delicacy of the fruits from which they are prepared, and are less expensive.

PREPARED BY JOSEPH BURNETT & CO.,
Boston.

JULES HAUEL'S Eau Lustrale Hair Restorative is the most astonishing toilet article in the world for cleansing and preserving the hair and beard. It once or twice, it gives the beautiful gloss and softness, and a most delightful fragrance. It prevents the hair falling out, also strengthens the roots, and prevents it falling out. Sold by all druggists, and by JULES HAUEL & CO., No. 764 Chestnut street, Philadelphia.

DR. SWEET'S INFALLIBLE LINIMENT is the great External Remedy of the age.

IF WHISKERS AND MUSTACHES won't grow upon your face, use my organic preparation. It will force them to grow six weeks from the first application, and whether dark or light to the skin. Price $1. Sent by mail, post free, to any address. R. G. GRAHAM, 162 Nassau street, New York.

Now is the time to Subscribe to the Best Story Paper Published.

THE NEW YORK WEEKLY.

Another Brilliant Story from the Pen of

Harry Hazel,

Author of "THE MUTE SPY," "MAD JACK," "THREE PIRATES," "YANKEE JACK," "THE RIVAL SISTERS," &c., &c.,

Entitled

THE WEST POINT CADET,

OR,

The Young Officer's Bride.

A ROMANCE OF REAL LIFE.

Will be commenced in the columns of

The New York Weekly

OF DECEMBER 29, WHICH WILL BE READY ON THURSDAY, DEC. 15.

It is unnecessary for us to say any thing in favor of Harry Hazel as a writer. His thrilling romances have permeated every part of the Union, and have been read by millions. We bespeak for "THE WEST POINT CADET," in advance, an unbounded popularity.

The New York Weekly

Is for sale by every News Agent throughout the United States. Price four cents per copy.

When sent by mail, the price will invariably be as follows:

One copy, per year	$2
Four copies, per year	$ 6
Ten copies	15
Eight Copies	12

Postmasters and others who get up clubs of ten, and send us $15 at one time, will be entitled to an extra copy for their trouble.

A Premium is given to each Subscriber. Specimen Numbers sent free.

The bills of uncurrent banks taken at par. Canada subscribers must send twenty-five cents extra with every subscription to prepay the American postage.

STREET & SMITH, Proprietors NEW YORK WEEKLY
32 Beekman Street.

Mercantile Record.

Patent Champion Safes.
S. C. HERRING & Co., 251 Broadway.

Phelan's Billiard Tables.
O'Connor & Alliaume, 63 to 67 Crosby street.

H. B. Dodworth, Band Master, & Astor Place—Professor and Dealer in Music and Instruments.

Piano-Fortes.
Webb & Allen, 1 Clinton Hall, Astor Place, N. Y.

Direction Labels and Tags.
Meagher, Vietor & Co., 119 Chambers Street.

THE GREAT FAMILY PAPER.
THE GREAT FAMILY PAPER.
THE GREAT FAMILY PAPER.
THE GREAT FAMILY PAPER.
THE GREAT FAMILY PAPER.

PROSPECTUS
OF
THE NEW YORK LEDGER.

As an indication of the popularity of the LEDGER, we need only state the simple fact that its circulation is larger than that of any other TEN literary papers in the country. Its success is owing to the fact that the proprietor accords the best writers in the country, and spares no expense in getting the BEST LITERARY PABULUM—a paper of high moral tone. The exalted reputation of the paper for truthful and pure literature, and healthy character of all its articles, the care which is taken that not any even one objectionable word shall appear in its columns, and the superiority of its Tales and Sketches, have rendered it the FAVORITE FAMILY JOURNAL of the day. Its literary paper has ever taken rank in the second, and always has held, since the LEDGER attained its immense circulation, that a heavy responsibility rested upon us, and have endeavored to discharge that responsibility conscientiously, filling readers daily with matter we should receive the thanks of thousands and tens of thousands of families.

As to the future, we are at a loss what to say. We prefer to promise rather than to promise. We have no horse-fore done to know to our readers; they know what the LEDGER has been and is now, and must therefore judge what it will be hereafter. We can only say that no pains will be spared to make it BETTER.

EDWARD EVERETT, WM. M. EVARTS,
CHARLES DICKENS, GEO. P. MORRIS,
PAUL HUREIY, F. WILLIS,
Hon. R. J. RAYMOND, ANNA CORA RITCHIE,
GEO. D. PRENTICE, FANNY FORRESTER,
JOHN G. SAXE, MRS. SIGOURNEY,
STEPHENS, JR., MRS. SOUTHWORTH,
EMERSON BENNETT, MARION HARLAND,
WM. B. WALLACE, ALICE CARY,
CARLOS D. STUART, EMMA A. BROWN,
REV. W. D. WILSON, SALLIE M. BIXBY, and numerous lawyers, clergymen, Professors in Colleges, Judges, and Statesmen for the LEDGER guarantee, and that our complete arrangements are such that the current expenses of the paper will be met without its contributing to at the rate of over three hundred thousand dollars per annum.

LASTLY—We supply with them more and more valuable comments that could be made, and commence will therefore be dispensed with. As we have already intimated, we shall leave promising to those who prefer to expend their time and words, and confine ourselves to what we can to make the LEDGER the most interesting and valuable paper in the country.

THE NEW YORK LEDGER is published every Saturday, and sold for SEVEN CENTS per copy, or three dollars per annum. Subscriptions can be mailed to effect at ten dollars per annum; two copies for five dollars. Any Postmaster obtaining eight subscribers at $1 for each (which is our lowest club rate), and sending to us $8, will be entitled to one copy for a year, gratis.

☞ The postage on the LEDGER to any part of the United States, paid quarterly or yearly, in advance, at the office where it is received, is only twenty-six cents a year. Canada subscribers must each send us twenty-six cents in addition to the subscription price of the LEDGER, to pay the annual postage.

☞ Subscribers will please write their addresses, including the name of the place, county, and State in which they reside, in a plain hand, so as to avoid mistakes.

☞ Postmasters are requested to form clubs, in large villages, or other places where news-agents are not established.

☞ All communications must be addressed, postage paid, to

Proprietor of the New York Ledger,
No. 67 Nassau street, N. Y.

Watches and Jewelry,
At No. 11 Wall Street, Up Stairs.
Special and Important Notice.

Gold Watches, 18 karats, only $15; worth $30.
Sterling Silver Watches, only $7 worth $16.
Every style of Watch from $9 upwards.
Also a splendid assortment of Jewelry.
Only for a few days to make room for other Goods.
J. MACDUFF, No. 11 Wall Street, up stairs.

DUFUY'S EXQUISITE FRENCH PERFUMERY. Liquid Rouge, dry Fragrance, Floral Pomades, Hair Oils, and Cosmetics, for the toilet and nursery. At No. 602 Broadway.

The Lover's Trial.

BY JULIA CAREY RHEINHARDT.

"Words are lost words," the lady said,
With a slow swaying of the head,
Still hushing her small hand aloof;
"Your vows are fair, if well believed,
But as for me! being once deceived,
I swear, no, once more further proof!"

In agony before her fled
Dropped down the youth; his hands did meet
Above his wildly throbbing heart;
"Name my trial that you will—
And if by courage, strength, and skill
It can be done, I'll play my part.

"Some giant would you have me slay,
Or kill some lion by the way?
But tell me, and you'll find it done!"
The lady smiled at some odd thought,
And in her dazzling eyes we caught
A sparkle of malicious fun.

"No proof as rough," she said, "but fly
To Fulton Street, and buy
An outfit from Smith's Manhe Tshirt!
The clothes you'll find the cheapest, best,
In all the world—and when so dressed,
You'll find me not a shrub divinely!"

"Twin Temples of Fashion."

ONE PRICE—NO DEVIATION.
The Price is marked on all the Goods in Plain Figures.

SMITH BROTHERS,
The Marble Stores,
122, 138, and 140 Fulton Street,
Between Broadway and William St.,

THOMAS SMITH, Jr.,
JOSEPH SMITH,
J. SMITH RICE.

NEW YORK.

Ladies' Furs at Genin's Bazaar, 513 Broadway.
Under the Metropolitan Nicholas Hotel.
HUDSON BAY SABLE,
MINK, MARTEN, RUSSIAN SABLE,
SILVER GREBE,
OF THE LATEST STYLES FROM EUROPE.
CHILDREN'S FURS, IN ELEGANT VARIETY,
STOCK LARGE, ASSORTMENT COMPLETE,
PRICES MODERATE.
GENIN'S BAZAAR,
513 Broadway.

Piano Fortes,

Of the newest style, finest tone, and lowest rates.
HALLET, DAVIS & BRO'S Manufactory,
Warerooms No. 99 Prince, near Broadway.

DUSSELDORF GALLERY, 548 BROADWAY.
In addition to upwards of 150 first-class Works of Art now exhibiting as above, D. FAUL AKERS' (the eminent American Sculptor) fine Statue of "DEAD PEARL DIVER."

With the great painting by "ANDREA GASTALDI" of

"PARISINA,"

From LORD BYRON'S CELEBRATED POEM of that name, are now on view.

Open Day and Evening. Admission 75 cents.

SANDS' SARSAPARILLA,

For chronic constitutional diseases, such as Rheumatism, King's Evil, Scrofula, obstinate Cutaneous Eruptions, Ulcers, Enlargement and Pain of the Bones, and other similar diseases; this preparation will be found a most

EFFECTUAL REMEDY.

Prepared and sold by A. B. & D. SANDS, Druggists, 100 Fulton Street, New York.

GEORGE G. EVANS,
PUBLISHER,
Originator of the Gift-book Business,
And Proprietor of the largest
Gift Book Establishment in the country,
No. 439 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia.

All Books are sold at the Publishers' lowest prices. You have the advantage of getting a handsome present worth from 50 cents to $100 with each book that you buy. You can select from the

LARGEST STOCK OF BOOKS
IN THE COUNTRY.

NEW PUBLICATIONS IN THE

BOOK OF PLAYS
FOR HOME AMUSEMENT
AND PRIVATE
THEATRICAL ENTERTAINMENTS.

BEING A
COLLECTION OF ORIGINAL AND SELECTED
TRAGEDIES, COMEDIES, FARCES, DRAMAS, FARCES, BURLESQUES, NURSERY SCRIPTURE, ANCIENT AND MODERN CHARADES, RECITATIONS, PARLOR PANTOMIMES AND TABLEAUX, VARIOUS SERIO, AND COMIC LECTURES AND STORIES, ETC., ETC., ETC.

With full Descriptions of Costume, Scenery, Properties, etc., and every direction relative for a private or public performance. The whole carefully arranged and adapted by

SILAS S. STEELE,
DRAMATIST.

Handsomely bound in one volume, 12mo, Cloth. Price $1 00.

Memoirs
OF
Robert Houdin,
Prestidigiteur,
Professor of Sleight of Hand, etc.
WRITTEN BY HIMSELF.

EDITED BY
Dr. R. SHELTON MACKENZIE.

One volume 12mo, Cloth. Price $1 00.

Book of Humorous Poetry.

COMPRISING
A choice selection of the best productions of the most popular American and English Poets.
One volume 12mo, Cloth. Price $1 00.

Heroes & Patriots of the South
By Cecil B. Hartley.

Comprising, Lives of General Francis Marion, General Moultrie, General Sumter, Hamilton Gates, etc., etc. &c.
One volume 12mo, Cloth. Illustrated. Price $1 00.

The Life of
Col. David Crockett,
WRITTEN BY HIMSELF.

Comprising Hunting Adventures, and During Deeds during the Texan War of Independence, together with an Account of his Glorious Death at the Alamo.
In one 12mo volume. Handsomely bound. Price $1.

The Prince of the House of David.
By the Rev. J. H. Ingraham, LL.D.

One volume 12mo, Cloth, with a Gilt, Price $1 25.

The Pillar of Fire.
By the Rev. J. H. Ingraham, LL.D.

One volume 12mo, Cloth, with a Gilt, Price $1 25.

Copies of either of the above Books, with a handsome Gilt, worth from 50 cents to $100, will be sent to any person in the United States, upon receipt of $1 00, and 25 cents to pay postage, by addressing the Publisher.

SEND FOR A COMPLETE CLASSIFIED CATALOGUE OF BOOKS, which will be mailed to you free of expense, and contains more than one hundred pages. The largest stock in the country to buy books, is at the large and reliable gift book establishment of

GEORGE G. EVANS,
Publisher, and Originator of the GIFT BOOK BUSINESS,
No. 439 Chestnut Street,
PHILADELPHIA.

FURS AT GENIN'S BAZAAR,
507 and 513 Broadway.

300 MINK CAPES AT $20, WORTH $35.
200 MINK CAPES AT $30, WORTH $45.
MINK FISHER CAPES, FROM $65 AND UP.
WARES—
HUDSON BAY SABLE CAPES, FROM $85 AND UPWARD.
GENIN'S BAZAAR
507 and 513 Broadway.

THE ARTILLERIST'S MANUAL.
Compiled from various sources, and adapted to THE SERVICE OF THE UNITED STATES.
ILLUSTRATED WITH ENGRAVINGS.
By LAFT. JOHN GIBBON, U. S. A.
Half morocco, $5. Sent free by mail, on receipt of price. D. VAN NOSTRAND, Publisher,
No. 192 Broadway.

MUSICAL BOXES,

Playing 2, 3, 4, 6, 8, 10, 12, 16, 24, and 36 tunes.
PALLARD & MARTIN, Importers,
Musical Boxes repaired. 31 Maiden Lane, N. Y.

BRANDRETH'S PILLS ARE GROWING more in favor with the public. It is now overcome by any and the best purgative yet put forth from the world of medicine. The thing proposed to be done by them is superseded all other medicines—and the many thousands of which they are composed can exactly be obtained by druggists or the makers of other pills. Dr. Brandreth has them grown and prepared without regard to the expense. And this care to make a superior purgative is appreciated, as the sales indicate. Other purgatives are dragging a lingering existence, and will soon have become merit. But Brandreth's Pills are safe and sure—they are universal—and adapted to superior human uses. No valuable fruit is harvested from thistle or worm-eat material, which, when taken out of the system, leaves nothing. They are as pleasant as a truly effective medicine can be. To say that they will not sometimes gripe the patient would be true, but the pain they give is as 0; therefore they remove those crabs and hard humors from the blood which are the occasion of disease. They open natural avenues, and this can not always be done pleasantly.

It is true you may take pills enough to kill each operate without pain, because they take the balsamic parts from the blood, which in worse than kept there, and thereby leaving the vital fluid adulterated. Beware of them. Brandreth's Pills are not of this kind. They are those which the life-giving fluid, and so evacuate. They are solely as nutritious food, and the system takes the thing best, and rejects the rest. Hence the purgative and heroin is their great value. The man is thrice blessed who is to fortune and to nature promises due, for good and almost perfect gift to man, because he has to a great extent, his body insured in health by Brandreth's blood use.

Mr. J. C. Rappelyea, of Monmouth County, N. J., writes, March 19, 1857:—

"I was taken sick in January last with confluence for rest, and took a ten grains of calomel to obtain relief. I dare not take it, and I was sick for weeks a year than ten, which my neighbors considered found it impossible to arrest. This was followed by a severe attack of typhoid fever, in my living memory. I was then sent me at 5 o'clock. A friend from New York, Mr. George Lawrie, fortunately called on me, and I commenced using Pills. I thought in my weak condition one pill would be enough, but I was mistaken. I took two that evening, morning four more. Much impurity came from me, and, to my surprise, the nervous and pain disappeared. In a her cured me fully. I am now hearty, with a fine appetite."

Dr. James Lull, of Pittsburg, N. Y., writes, August 11, 1859:—

"I last with a sore throat two weeks ago. It was so bad slightly injured his finger two or three days before, which caused internal pain, swelling, and sickness. When I saw him the pain and swelling had extended to his shoulder, depriving the of sleep. The throat also was turning dark-colored, and on the point of mortification. His doctor was present at the time of his case. I got them at evening, and during the night I gave him a whole box of pills, applied a Brandreth poultice to the arm and side.

"In a Rose, of Madrid, St. Lawrence County, N. Y., writes, August 24, 1859:—

"I can honestly and confidently recommend Brandreth's Pills to the fatherland as a safe, sure, and effectual medicine I have ever dealt in during my thirteen years' experience as a druggist. In cases of jaundice, long settled them in hundreds of cases of almost every form of disease with the happiest results. I am and I assure I believe they are the best medicine, as a universal remedy, that the world has yet produced."

TWENTY YEARS' EXPERIENCE.

"I am now 52 years of age. Twenty-two years of my past life I spent in the ministry. For 20 years I have used Brandreth's Pills in my family medicine, and I wish no other. During these 20 years I have never had occasion to call a physician to my family, save in the sickness of my wife with children.

D. M. BARTLETT,

Associate Publisher of the New Brunswick Intelligencer.

VALUABLE FAMILY MEDICINE.

All the ingredients of BRANDRETH'S PILLS are purgative, and act in conjunction to open, detach, dissolve, cleanse, and remove from the body all offending matter and injurious. By their action the blood is purified, the bile and milk with the blood to search out all bad humors. They dissolve all unhealthy accumulations from the blood, and cure tubercles, ulcers, &c., let them be in what part of the system they may. They injure no part of the body. They carry away nothing that is good. They only remove what is bad. They search out and agree with it, and with it, and always do their work well. Thus they are known as a valuable pill.

Sold at principal office, 294 Canal Street, New York; price 25 cents a box, and by all druggists.

DR. STEPHEN SMITH'S SPECTACLES, CONNECTICUT, is the author of "Dr. Scott's Infallible Lieutenant."

METALLIC BAROMETERS. — Patented June 14, 1859.—Portable, durable, and handsome. One instrument may be given as a present to a dozen friends. Warranted to arrive safe, and exchanged if not satisfactory. Sent by express. Price $5.

VICTOR DUPONCHEL,
No. 179 Centre Street, New York.

To Housekeepers.—The attention of heads of families is respectfully invited to the superior quality of Burnett's Flavoring Extracts.

They are entirely free from the poisonous oils and acids which enter into the composition of many of the factitious fruit flavors now in the market. They are highly concentrated, have all the freshness and delicacy of the fruits from which they are prepared, and are less expensive.

PREPARED BY JOSEPH BURNETT & CO.,
Boston.

CANTATE DOMINO. — A collection of Chants, Hymns, and Tunes, designed to meet the requirements of the new Liturgy of the Church. Performed Church and of Protestant Choirs generally. By L. H. Sherwood & H. Schirmer. Price, in boards, $13.50 per dozen.

Published by OLIVER DITSON & CO., Boston.

Two Works Valuable to Sick or Well.

Sent by mail, no pay expected until received, read, and approved.

Address Dr. S. S. FITCH, 714 Broadway, New York.

Inst. SIX LECTURES on the causes, prevention, and cure of Lung, Throat, and Skin diseases. For Males and Male and Female complaints. On the mode of Preserving Health to long old age. 144 pages, 16 Engravings. —Price 50 cents, in silver or P. O. stamps.

Vol. 2. A work on the Causes and Cure of Diseases of the Heart, Stomach, Liver, Bowels, and Kidneys; on Apoplexy, Palsy, and Dyspepsia; why we grow old and what causes disease. 151 pages, 6 engravings. Price 50 cents. Any which book you wish, giving name, state, county town, and post office.

JUST PUBLISHED.—On Single and Married Life; or, The Institutes of Marriage. By the late R. J. Culverwell, Esq. Price 25 cents, free of postage. For sale by H. DEXTER & CO., 119 Nassau Street, N. Y., and all Booksellers.

Paralyzed and Deformed Limbs Successfully Treated by Dr. J. F. MANN, No. 138 West 25th Street. Some remarkable cases and first names in the city given as references.

To Hotelkeepers.—The attention of hotels of this is respectfully called to the superior quality of Burnett's Flavoring Extracts.

They are entirely free from the poisonous oils and acids which enter into the composition of many of the factitious fruit flavors now in the market. They are highly concentrated, have all the freshness and delicacy of the fruits from which they are prepared, and are less expensive.

PREPARED BY JOSEPH BURNETT & CO.,
Boston.

Garnet and Coral Jewelry.—We invite attention to our late importation of Coral and Garnet Jewelry, consisting of Necklaces, Bracelets, and Necklaces, chasme, hair-pins, combs, lockets, clasps, &c.
OSBORNE, DOARDMAN & TOWNSEND,
No. 321 Broadway, corner of Spring Street.

PHOTOGRAPHY. — Handsome Rosewood Cases, Gilt Mats, and Glasses, for Pictures complete, with instructions, $20. A beautiful and selected assortment of STEREOSCOPIC SLIDES. Daguerreotype Materials, 681 Broadway, N. Y.

FEVER AND AGUE! CHILL FEVER!!
AND BILIOUS FEVER!!!

It is not a very difficult thing to break the spell—that is, for a time to scatter it over the system, with Quinine, Arsenic, or similar poison; but a specific medicine which not only breaks the fits, but eradicates it from the system, is a remedy worth having. Such is HUMPHREYS' HOMEOPATHIC SPECIFIC FLUID—a homœopathic sugar pill: it cures the disease; breaks up the fits; and eradicates it from the system; and even prevents it where persons have been exposed. Under the name of the most feeble, may take it with impunity. The most sickness enters are infinitely cured by it.

Price, 50 cents per box.

N. B.—A full set of HUMPHREYS' HOMEOPATHIC SPECIFICS, with Directions, and twenty different Remedies, in large vials, morocco case, with Book of Directions, complete, $5.

Sold by all druggists everywhere.

Dr. F. HUMPHREYS & CO.,
No. 562 Broadway, New York.

GREAT CURIOSITY.—Particulars sent free. Address, with stamp, Box 1,000, Boston, Mass.

From the NEW YORK COURIER AND INQUIRER, May 17, 1859.

PETTITAN SWEET.—Petittan Medicines most persons are justly prejudiced. Health is too valuable to be trifled with. Any one who has a patent medicine to cure would wish to take a patent medicine of which he knows nothing except what is said by the maker of it, a person who, for all he knows, may be an arrant knave. The Petittan Medicines are not included in this category. There is every evidence to believe that there is no humbug about it. It is a medicine of the highest order, prepared by a new method. The proprietors are men of high character, and their recommendations are to be relied upon. The best evidence even to be placed. They do not claim that their medicine will cure all the ills that flesh is heir to, but they do claim that it will be found most efficacious. The diseases to which iron is prescribed by physicians are many, and though the remedy is regarded as one of the most useful in the pharmacopœia, yet the terrible results are not always calculated, for the reason that it is sometimes difficult to find in what form it should be administered. It is also to be asserted by physiological chemists, iron can only enter the circulation in a state of solution. In the Petittan, then it administered in their form it would save the stomach from many disorders. The Petittan, however, is said to be a very agreeable preparation, and liable to be converted into another form. The Petittan Sweet differs from the old Petittan, in the use of Quinine, which by it is so combined by chemical ingenuity as to remain in solution in any climate or temperature.

Pamphlets containing numerous certificates of cures from eminent persons, and full directions, to be had on application to the Agents, or to

R. H. CLARK & CO., Proprietors,
No. 76 Sudbury Street, Boston.
Sold by Druggists generally in the United States.

Ladd, Webster & Co.,

INVITE ATTENTION TO THEIR

IMPROVED TIGHT-STITCH

Sewing Machines,

WHICH FOR BEAUTY AND SIMPLICITY OF CONSTRUCTION, AND EFFICIENCY IN WORKING, ARE UNEQUALED BY ANY.

660 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.
17 SUMMER STREET, BOSTON.
923 CHESTNUT STREET, PHILADELPHIA.
202 BALTIMORE STREET, BALTIMORE.
AND WEST FOURTH STREET, CINCINNATI.

ALBERT WEBER, Piano-Forte Manufacturer, No. 195 West Broadway, near Canal St. Has been established in this city for three years, at the lowest prices. Call and examine before purchasing.

A NTI-ARTHRITIC WINE.—A CERTAIN CURE FOR
GOUT AND RHEUMATISM.
PEYSSON, DELTHIL & COMP'Y,
Wholesale Druggists,
15 Beekman Street, New York.

ALSO,

Quevu's Patent Jellified Castor-Oil.—The greasy sensation of the oil is obviated, and it does not cause any constipation after use. It is the best purgative for children. To be had at the Inventor's Office, No. 125 Fourth Avenue, and of all respectable druggists. PEYSSON, PARKER & MOWER, Wholesale Agents, No. 15 Beekman Street.

THE NEW BOOKS

MICHAUX'S LIFE (Abridged), $1.50.
LIFE OF CHARLES THE BOLD, Duke of Burgundy, $1.50.
THE GREAT TRIBULATION. By Dr. Cumming. $1.00.
* Sent by mail, postage free, on receipt of price, by RUDD & CARLETON, 130 Grand Street, New York.

Grover & Baker's
NOISELESS
Family Sewing Machines,
AT REDUCED PRICES

GROVER & BAKER S. M. CO.,
New York, Oct. 21, 1859.

The undersigned, Ministers and Laymen of the Methodist Episcopal Church, having purchased and used in their families GROVER AND BAKER'S CELEBRATED FAMILY SEWING MACHINE, take pleasure in recommending it to the public as a machine fully combining the essentials of a good machine. Its beautiful simplicity, ease of management, and noiseless movement, render it a most desirable article for every family. Machines manufactured by any in the market, and sent to any part of the country, on receipt of price, with the directions for using. Every machine will give satisfaction in all who may purchase and use it.

N. P. CRANSTON, C. LAUER,
N. VANSANT, J. C. CHATTERTON,
D. D. LORE, W. HOSKINS,
S. ANNIS, M. ALLISON.

GROVER & BAKER S. M. CO., No. 495 Broadway, New York; No. 730 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia; 181 Baltimore Street, Baltimore; 18 West Fourth Street, Cincinnati; 119 Montgomery Street, San Francisco; 32 St. Francis Street, Montreal; 11 Camp Street, New Orleans.

ALL MACHINES WARRANTED.

SEND FOR A CIRCULAR.

SANFORD'S HOT-AIR FURNACES,
PORTABLE OR SET IN BRICK,
THOUSANDS IN USE IN THIRTEEN STATES.
SEND FOR A BOOK—FREE.
SANFORD'S PATENT PORTABLE STEAM HEATER.
A favorite and economical Stove of great power.
SEND FOR A BOOK.
SANFORD, TRUSLOW & CO.,
No. 229 West 23d Street.

Singer's Sewing Machines.

SINGER'S No. 2 SEWING MACHINE, $100.
SINGER'S No. 1 SEWING MACHINE, $90.
HEMMING GAUGES REDUCED TO $2.

Singer's Family Sewing Machines at $50 and $75 are capable of performing, in the best style, all the sewing of a private family.

Send for a copy of I. M. Singer & Co.'s Gazette, which contains full and reliable information about sewing machines, etc., of Sewing Machines, and will be supplied gratis.

I. M. SINGER & CO.,
No. 458 Broadway, New York.

361 REWARD! $39
BRIDAL SUITE,
Tucker's Flowers, Leaflets, and Miscellaneous Items, Are all reliable.

Wistar's Balsam of Wild Cherry.

This remedy has long been cherished by the community for its wonderful power in relieving, healing, and curing the most obstinate, painful, and long-standing cases of COUGH, COLD, INFLUENZA, SORE THROAT, BRONCHITIS, WHOOPING COUGH, CROUP, ASTHMA, INFLAMMATION of the LUNGS: while even CONSUMPTION itself has yielded to its magic influence, when all other known means have failed.

The whole history of this Balsam, which has now become a household word, proves that the past has produced no remedy approaching it in value and usefulness, while the future will hardly present one of equal value.

The proprietors, Messrs. Comstock, of which there are several worthless ones, are that each bottle has the written signature of I. BUTTS, and on the outside wrapper of the Proprietors, "Seth W. Fowle & Co., Boston," an the outside wrapper.

Sold by Druggists and Dealers everywhere.

Wistar's Balsam of Wild Cherry.

FOR THE HOLIDAYS.
YOUTH'S CHEMICAL CABINETS,
Containing upwards of 50 Chemical Preparations, Tests, and useful Apparatus, with a Book of Instructions for performing 170 select and amusing Chemical Experiments, without strong acids or other deleterious and dangerous articles. They are perfectly safe in the hands of youth of both sexes, and are admirably adapted as presents, and will afford a most fruitful Text for Chemistry in the youthful mind. In redwood boxes. 9x14 inches, price $2; large size, 11x17 inches, price $10.
For sale by JAMES R. GILLET,
Practical Chemist, 116 John Street, N. Y.

Partial Deafness-Discharges from the Ear NOISES IN THE HEAD, CATARRH,
And all diseases of the THOAT, EYE and EAR permanently cured by
DR. LIGHTHILL, No. 21 Bond Street, N. Y.
☞ Pamphlets sent gratis.

HUNGARIAN WINES.—A parcel of superior, pure, old HUNGARIAN WINES, in wood and in glass, for sale by
CHARLES F. LOOSEY,
No. 2 Hanover Square, Room No. 6.

C. G. GUNTHER & SONS—FURS.—
At their warehouse,
No. 55 MAIDEN LANE,
Have opened
THEIR ENTIRE STOCK FOR THE SEASON
OF MANUFACTURED
FURS,
Comprising all the leading and desirable styles, together with additional novelties
IN LADIES' FURS,
GENTLEMEN'S FURS,
CHILDREN'S FURS,
FUR ROBES.
We solicit the inspection of the retail trade to the above, and offer our goods at the most advantageous prices.
C. G. GUNTHER & SONS,
No. 55 Maiden Lane.

BUY your FURS of WILLIAMS, No. 293 FULTON STREET, BROOKLYN.

Special Announcement
FROM THE
Quaker City Publishing House!

100,000 Catalogues,
NEW, ENLARGED AND BETTER—NOW READY FOR DISTRIBUTION.

Superior Inducements to the Public!

EF A saving of from one to two dollars on every GOLD AND SILVER WATCHES, and other valuable Prizes. Full particulars given in Catalogues, which will be sent free to all upon application.

Valuable Gifts, worth from 50 cents to $100, GUARANTEED to each purchaser. $10,000 in GOLD and SILVER WATCHES, and other valuable Prizes, during the months—$150,000 to be distributed during the next six months.

The inducements offered Agents are more liberal than ever. We have now in the field

Blanks being in the Publishing and Bookselling business, and the Gift Enterprise, we experience enables us to conduct the Gift Enterprise with the greatest satisfaction to all.

EF AGENTS WANTED in every Town and County, for full particulars address, with stamp, for CIRCULARS,
Quaker City Publishing House,
23 South Third Street,
Philadelphia, Pa.

Ayer's Cathartic Pills,
FOR ALL THE PURPOSES OF A
FAMILY PHYSIC,

are so compound that elements within the range of their action operate powerfully on the internal viscera, purifying properties search, and cleanse, and invigorate every portion of the system diseased. Minute in its dissected action, and restoring its healthy vitalities. As a consequence of their power over the source of life, the lowest down with pain or physical debility is astonished to find his health or energy restored at once, and his sickness simple and inviting.

Not only do they purge the every-day complaints of everybody, but also many formidable and dangerous diseases; such as Dyspepsia, Liver Complaint, Dysentery, Diarrhœa, Dysentery, Rheumatism, Gout, Skinsick, Erysipelas, Headache, Piles, Rheumatism, Neuralgia, Dropsy, Ulcers, Worms, Tumors, Scrofula, Consumption, and Skin Diseases, Liver Complaint, Dropsy, Tetter, Tumors, Worms, Ulcers, Scrofula, Neuralgia, as a Dinner Pill, and for Purifying the Blood.

They are sugar-coated, so that the most sensitive can take them pleasantly, and they are the best aperient in the world for all the purposes of a family physic.

Price 25 cents per Box: Five Boxes for $1.00.

PREPARED BY
DR. J. C. AYER & CO.,
LOWELL, MASS.
Sold by all Druggists everywhere.

A Beautiful Complexion.—Laird's Bloom of Youth, or Kalliston, is the best and only preparation in the world for all purposes of beautifying and preserving the complexion and skin. Prepared only by JAMES T. LAIRD & CO., New York, and LAIRD'S ladies' hair-dressing establishment, 479 Broadway.

THE ORIGINAL BRIDGEWATER PAINT OF NEW JERSEY, Established 1850, Manufactured by the Bridgewater Mfg. Co., The Original Paint, Paper, &c., dries readily, forming a metallic coat, spark proof, and fire proof. Depot, 191 Fulton Street, corner of Maiden Lane, New York.
HICKS & BUTTS, Agents.

FINKLE & LYON'S SEWING MACHINES are warranted to give satisfaction than any other machine in the market, or no sale.
S.H.—PRICE REDUCED TO $50.
No. 852 Broadway.

Forty Dollars per Month.
500 Agents wanted to travel and solicit orders for the celebrated Wheeler and Wilson Sewing Machine. Salary $40 per month, with all expenses paid. For agents' terms, and full particulars, address, with stamp enclosed for return postage,
H. DAGGETT & CO.,
Boston, Mass.

Commencement of the Twentieth Volume.
HARPER'S NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE
FOR DECEMBER.

TERMS.

One Copy for One Year	$ 3 00
Two Copies for One Year	5 00
Three or more Copies for One Year (each)	2 00

And an Extra Copy, gratis, for every Club of TEN SUBSCRIBERS.

HARPER'S WEEKLY and HARPER'S MAGAZINE, together, one year, $5.00.

The Postage upon "HARPER'S MAGAZINE" must be paid at the office where it is received. The Postage is Thirty-six Cents a year.

HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.
A FIRST-CLASS ILLUSTRATED PAPER.
THE BEST AND CHEAPEST
FAMILY NEWSPAPER IN THE WORLD.

FIVE CENTS A NUMBER: $2.50 A YEAR.

THE VOLUME FOR 1859 will contain a tale, entitled "THE WOMAN IN WHITE," splendidly illustrated by F. O. C. DARLEY, and commenced in "HARPER'S WEEKLY" for November 26, and will be continued from week to week until finished.

GEO. WILLIAM CURTIS'S Illustrated Serial Tale of Associate Life, entitled "THE POTIPHAR PAPERS," is continued in "HARPER'S WEEKLY" for April 2.

TERMS OF HARPER'S WEEKLY.

One Copy for Twenty Weeks	$1 00
One Copy for One Year	2 50
One Copy for Two Years	4 00
Two Copies for One Year	4 00
Twelve Copies for One Year	20 00
Twenty-five Copies for One Year	40 00

An Extra Copy will be allowed for every Club of TWENTY or TWENTY-FIVE SUBSCRIBERS.

TERMS FOR ADVERTISING.—Fifty Cents a Line.

☞ No Advertisement will be inserted in these wishing to Advertise for three Months or more.

. Persons living in the City of New York wishing "HARPER'S WEEKLY" left at their houses, will please send their names and residences, with the subscription money, to the Office of Publication.

HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers,
Franklin Square, New York.

HOW TO MAKE RICH MEN VOTE.

WEALTHY CITIZEN OF NEW YORK. "It's very hard to bear, but I don't think I'll go to the Polls after all."
PRACTICAL POLITICIAN. "Won't vote yet, eh! All right! Jim, clap that 66 on his little finger. Perhaps that'll fetch him!"

ADVERTISEMENTS.

481 BROADWAY.

GREAT SALE of RICH SILKS

1500 Pieces New Styles,

At 75 cents per yard.

REDUCED FROM $1 25.

1000 Pieces Extra Quality

ONLY $1 00 PER YARD.

REDUCED FROM $1 75.

Observe the name and number,

G. M. BODINE,

No. 481 Broadway.

WARM CLOTHING.

We now offer large assortments of Fall and Winter Clothing, just manufactured, in our best styles, consisting in part of

ESQUIMAUX BEAVERS,
MOSCOW BEAVERS,
ELDER DOWN BEAVERS,
MAGENTA BEAVERS,
PRESIDENT BEAVERS,
CLARENCE BEAVERS,
BREADCRAGGIT BEAVERS,

Also, complete suits of all styles of CASHMERE and Beaver suits, and all the late styles Velvet and Cashmere Vestings, &c., &c.

BOYS' CLOTHING
AND FURNISHING GOODS
in great variety, at the lowest prices of the trade.

D. DEVLIN & CO.,
Nos. 259, 261, and 263 Broadway.

THIS SPLENDID Strong-bodied Cigar is offered at

Mountain COFFEE,

For sale by COUTRELL & CO No. 6 Bowery Street.

Sheldon & Company,
No. 115 Nassau Street, N. Y.,
Have just Published:

Sermons. By Richard Fuller, D.D., Of Baltimore. 1 volume. 12mo. Price, $1 00.

Fifty Years among the Baptists. By David Benedict, D.D., author of "History of the Baptists." 1 volume. 12mo. Price, $1 00.

Nearly Ready,

The Wife's Trials and Triumphs. By the Author of "Grace Hamilton's School Days," "Elsydeen Lodge," &c., &c. 1 volume. 12mo. Beautifully printed on tinted paper. Price, $1 00.

Sent by mail on receipt of the prices annexed.

PARTNER WANTED.
With One or $2000.

$8000 Profits Guaranteed. I want a good business man to take the Southern States to sell for a new article that took three Premiums over all U. S. Fair. Profits large: Sales unprecedented. Address, The Inventor, W. S. D., P.O. Box 129, Fulton City, Illinois.

32. HEALTH OF 32.
AMERICAN WOMEN.

It has often been a sad reflection that the physiological anatomy of women has rendered her liable to suffering and disease, for which a reliable remedy has never been found in the regular medical profession. Every mother of a family, and most females above 16 years of age, fully experience this. Having positive, wealth and motivated taste after no exemption to this rule. So universal are these sufferings of women from the age of 16 to 45 years, that every one is interested in obtaining certain relief. Irregularities, local displacements, general debility and nervousness seem to be the common lot of women during the above period of their lives.

The experience of many years, the severe tests of investigation by scientific medical men, the use of the medicine in the practice and in the families of physicians, and its general use in the families of clergymen and among the most enlightened and refined in the country, has resulted in stamping the elegant and well-known preparation of the Graefenberg Company as the only reliable remedy ever known for the universal and distressing diseases of women.

It is prepared by an educated physician of great experience, and it will always be found fully equal to representations concerning it. It is known as The Graefenberg Company's FEMALE MEDICINE, or UTERINE CATHOLICON.

Price, $1 50 per bottle. ☞ FOR SIX DOLLARS FIVE BOTTLES ARE SENT BY EXPRESS, AND SO OTHER FEE PAID TO ANY OR EXPRESS LINE FROM NEW YORK. ☜

Address JOSHUA T. BEDELL, M.D., Secretary,
Consulting Physicians, Graefenberg Company, No. 32 PARK ROW, NEW YORK.

All of the Graefenberg medicines may be confidently relied upon. They have been before the public for 12 years, and consist of eleven remedies, suited to all diseases, of either sex, incident to this country and climate.

I have recently had I have examined a number of testimonials exhibited to me by the Graefenberg Company, relative to the merits of their medicines, and I take pleasure in saying that they present evidence of genuineness, and are entitled to confidence in the country and the public. N. BANGS, D.D., of the Methodist Church.

Having examined certificates of the Graefenberg Company, I take pleasure in saying that they present satisfactory evidence of genuineness, and are entitled to the confidence of the community. My personal acquaintance with some of the members of the Graefenberg Company justifies me in expressing the opinion that no medicines are sent out by them but such as are reliable. FREEMAN HALL, Editor and Proprietor New York Commercial Advertiser.

☞ The principles and practice of medicine adopted by the Medical Faculty of the Graefenberg Institution are clearly set forth in THE GRAEFENBERG MANUAL OF HEALTH, a valuable work of 200 pages, published for Family Use, and elegantly embellished with colored engravings of the human figure. Price 25 Cents. ☜ Upon the receipt of which it is mailed to any part of the country, free of postage.

DR. J. T. BARNES may be consulted professionally, or by letter, at his rooms in the Graefenberg Institution, No. 32 Park Row. Office hours, 9 to 1 and 3 to 4.

Designed for the use of the Medical Profession and the Family, having superseded the so-called "Gins" "aromatic," "cordial," "dedicated," &c., now indorsed by all of the prominent physicians, chemists, and connoisseurs as possessing all of those intrinsic medicinal qualities tonic and diuretic which belong to an old and pure Gin. Put up in quart bottles and sold by all druggists, grocers, &c.

A. M. BININGER & CO.,
(Established in 1778.) SOLE PROPRIETORS.
No. 826 Broadway, N. Y.

Fine Gold Jewelry
Imported.

Osborne, Boardman & Townsend,
527 Broadway,
Corner of Spring Street,

INVITE THE INSPECTION OF THE PUBLIC TO their Display of FINE GOLD IMPORTED JEWELRY, comprising all the NEWEST PATTERNS to be found abroad—comprising

ETRUSCAN,
ENAMELLED,
TURQUOISE,
GARNET,
CORAL, and
PEARL

FULL AND HALF SETS, BRACELETS, NECKLACES, CHAINS, CHATELAINES, BROOCHES, EAR RINGS, LOCKETS, SCARF PINS, SLEEVE BUTTONS, STUDS, &c., &c., &c.

Marksmite (Steel) Jewelry,
Pink and Red Coral Sets (from Naples),
Full Garnet Sets (from Leipsic),
Black Enamelled Jewelry.

We can confidently say that our assortment of FINE IMPORTED JEWELRY is more complete than can be found elsewhere. It was selected in Europe during the present season by one of our firm.

Before purchasing elsewhere, we request an inspection of our assortment.

ALSO, OUR USUAL ASSORTMENT OF
Rich Paris Fancy Articles,
GENEVA MUSIC BOXES, &c.

New Holiday Publications
or
Mayhew & Baker,
208 Washington Street, Boston.

New Book by the Author of "Modern Polesters."
THE KING OF THE GOLDEN RIVER.
By JOHN ROSSER, M.A.
21 Illustrations. Cloth, gilt. Price 75 cents.

HOME SONGS FOR LITTLE DARLINGS.
A New Illustrated Book of Songs for Children.
Price 50 cents.

Third Edition, now ready, of the Thrilling New Juvenile,
THE SEA OF ICE;
Or, THE ARCTIC ADVENTURERS.
Illustrated. Price 75 cents.

THE SEATER'S POCKET COMPANION.
A Complete Manual of the Art of Skating. Price 25 cts.

Catalogues of our Publications mailed free, and any Book sent by mail on receipt of price.

H. HEXTER & CO., M. DOOLADY,
113 Nassau Street, Wicker Street,
Wholesale Agents in New York. Boston.

A Lie Refuted.

"Who dyed your hair?" "It isn't dyed,"
The indignant gentleman replied.
"'Twas dead before, but now it's alive,
HEAVENER'S INIMITABLE made it thrive."

"Who said 'twas dyed?—he lied!
With him it was the truth that died.
The Wash invigorates and brings dead hair to life,
And he who doubts my word can ask my wife."

This "Inimitable" Restorative will restore gray hair to its original color, stop its falling out, and bring it out in bald heads. Sold everywhere.

W. E. MAGAN & CO., Proprietors, Troy, N. Y.

Dickens's Tale of Two Cities is now Published Complete.

A Tale of Two Cities.

By Charles Dickens (Boz).

WITH SPLENDID ORIGINAL ILLUSTRATIONS
BY MARCHAL.

TWENTY-FIVE DIFFERENT EDITIONS.

T. B. PETERSON & BROTHERS, 306 CHESTNUT STREET, PHILADELPHIA, having made arrangements with Harper & Brothers, New York, whereby Charles Dickens has been paid Five Thousand Dollars for the advance Sheets of "A TALE OF TWO CITIES," as it was written, they have just published the whole, complete and unabridged, one month prior to its publication in England, in the following Twenty-five styles, so as to match all the various and different editions of the former popular works by Charles Dickens, published by us.

Illustrated Duodecimo Editions.
Five Styles.

A TALE OF TWO CITIES. Complete in one large Duodecimo volume, with fine original Illustrations by MARCHAL, bound in cloth.....Price $2 00
" " bound in Full Law Library style..... 2 00
" " Half calf, marbled edges, &c. 3 50
" " Half calf, gilt..... 5 00
" " Half calf, antique..... 5 00

Peoples Duodecimo Editions.
Five Styles.

A TALE OF TWO CITIES. Complete in one large duodecimo volume, with two illustrations bound in black cloth,Price $1 00
" " bound in Full Law Library style..... 1 75
" " Half calf, or half Turkey..... 2 00
" " Half calf, antique..... 2 50
" " Half calf, marbled edges..... 2 50

Illustrated Octavo Editions.
Six Styles.

A TALE OF TWO CITIES. Complete in one large volume, with original Illustrations by MARCHAL, printed on the finest paper, and neatly bound in black cloth, in imitation of Farnsworth volume of our present Octavo Illustrated Edition.....Price $1 50
" " bound in Full Law Library style..... 2 00
" " Half calf, or half Turkey..... 3 25
" " Half calf, marbled edges,Finish 3 50
" " Half calf, antique..... 3 50
" " Half calf, gilt..... 4 00

Library Editions. Seven Styles.

A TALE OF TWO CITIES. Complete in one large volume, in the Seventh volume of our present Six Volume Library Edition, bound in black cloth, full gilt back or plain back.....Price $1 50
" " bound in Scarlet cloth, full gilt back..... 1 75
" " Full Law Library style..... 2 00
" " Half calf, or half Turkey..... 3 25
" " Half calf, marbled edges,Finish 3 50
" " Half calf, antique..... 3 50
" " Half calf, gilt..... 4 00

Paper Cover Editions.

A TALE OF TWO CITIES. Complete in one large volume, octavo.....Price 50 cents
" " Illustrated. One volume, octavo, paper cover..... 75 cents

☞ Copies of any one or all of the above editions of "A TALE OF TWO CITIES," will be sent at once, per mail, free of postage, to any person, to any part of the United States or Canada, on receipt of the price of the edition they may wish.

BOOKSELLERS, NEWS AGENTS, AND ALL OTHERS, WILL PLEASE ADDRESS THEIR ORDERS TO US AT ONCE—AS THEY WANT OF THE DIFFERENT EDITIONS, ALL OF WHICH WILL BE SUPPLIED AT OUR USUAL LOW RATES.

Address all orders to

T. B. PETERSON & BROTHERS,
No. 306 Chestnut Street, above Third, Philadelphia.

DR. J. B. MARCHISI'S
Celebrated Uterine Catholicon,
For the Relief and Cure of Suffering Females.

Climate and the usual habits of female life engender a variety of diseases which this Catholicon will penetrate and cure. It can be relied upon in any case of Painful, Suppressed, or Irregular Menstruation, Profuse Menstruation, Whites, Ulceration of the Uterus, Hysterics, Leucorrhœa, &c. In over sixty cases, which we have failed, this article is never taken without benefit. No suffering female should leave it unused. It is prepared, with full symptoms, treatment, letters, &c., sent (genteel) by mail, or delivered by any agent. It is sold in every town, or sent by express. Be cautious of an imitation, somewhat similar in name, with certificates altered, &c. Address BARNES & PARK, No. 12 Park Row, N. Y. ☞ DR. MARCHISI'S other remedies: WEEKS & POTTER, Boston; or CALLENDER & CO., Fifield, Chicago; or R. MARTIN, St. Louis, Mo. ☜

To Landlords.—The attention of heads of families is respectfully invited to the superior quality of

Burnett's Flavoring Extracts.

They are entirely free from the poisonous oils and acids which enter into the composition of many of the extracts usually sold in the market. They are highly concentrated, have all the freshness and delicacy of the fruits from which they are prepared, and are less expensive.

PREPARED BY JOSEPH BURNETT & CO.,
Boston.

Asthma.—Any medicine which will alleviate the Paroxysms of this dreadful disease, will be hailed with joy by thousands of sufferers. The certificates which accompany Jayne Wistowiar's Remedy, are from the most reliable sources, and attest to its wonderful power, even in the most severe cases.

Overcoats.—$3 00, $4 50, $5 00, $6 50, $10 and $20.
BUSINESS COATS.—$3 00, $3 50, $4 00, $5 00 & $10.
PANTS and VESTS.—$1 50 to $10. Gents' Furnishing Goods, at HUTCHINGS & SON'S
Mammoth Clothing Store,
Nos. 240 and 242 Bowery.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

VOL. III.—No. 155.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, DECEMBER 17, 1859. [PRICE FIVE CENTS.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1859, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

THE FUNERAL SERVICE AT CHRIST CHURCH, TARRYTOWN, NEW YORK, AT THE BURIAL OF WASHINGTON IRVING.

THE FUNERAL OF WASHINGTON IRVING.

We continue on the preceding page the burial-service performed over the last Monday, in Christ Church, Tarrytown, over the body of the late Washington Irving.

The body was dressed in a plain black suit, with white cravat; and, as usual, the lid of the coffin was left open, in order that the countenance might obtain a last glance at the features of the deceased. At noon, on the 24, the procession left Sunnyside for Tarrytown. About a thousand people, mostly from New York, were present; among them were many of the most distinguished literary men of the day, and a delegation from the Common Council of the City. The officiating clergy were the Rev. Dr. Creighton and his assistant, Mr. Spencer. The Tribune reporter thus describes the ceremony:

"In accordance with the often-expressed wish of Mr. Irving, the services were strictly in keeping with the simple form of the Church of England, with no unusual address or ceremony. A few minutes after one the coffin was brought up the main aisle, preceded by the Rev. Dr. Creighton and the Rev. Mr. Spencer, the latter of whom read the first: 'I am the Resurrection and the Life, saith the Lord,' and the pall-bearers, of whom there were eight, as follows: Governor Seward, of Auburn; Judge Daly, of New York; the oldest personal friend of the deceased; Dr. J. G. Coggswell, librarian of the Astor Library; Professor Longfellow; Colonel Thomas A. Hamilton; Colonel James Watson Webb; Henry Shelton, Esq.; Moses H. Grinnell, Esq., and Jonathan Sturges, Esq., the last three gentlemen being co-executors of Mr. Irving, and his near friends.

"The mourning relatives followed the coffin, and took the seats reserved for them. While the body was being placed in front of the chancel the choir chanted the anthem from the 39th and 90th Psalms, 'Lord, let me know my end, and the number of my days.' Directly following, the Lesson familiar to all, from the 15th chapter of 1st Corinthians, was impressively read by the Rev. Dr. Creighton. At the conclusion of the Lesson the choir sang the last three stanzas of the 90th Hymn, commencing, 'Behold, the anonumbered Angel host.' At its close the Rector stated there would be no more services at the church and that all who chose could have an opportunity of viewing the features of the deceased.

"Passing up the south aisle and down the north, the people looked at the beloved remains. The coffin was of dark-brown cloth, with gilt ribbon studded, and adorned with three wreaths of japonicas not used with Isaiel. On a silver plate was the simple inscription:

WASHINGTON IRVING.
BORN APRIL 3, A.D. 1783.
DIED NOVEMBER 28, A.D. 1859.

"Just before the lid was closed, a ray of sunlight, shooting through the illumined glass of the south window, lit up the serene face with a glory that seemed the very radiex of the brighter land."

LOVED AND LOST.

"ICH HABE GELEBT UND GELIEBET."

So you tell me Annie's dying, dying all for love of me!
Spirits gone and beauty flying, cheek as pale as flesh may be;
And you say me in your sister, telling me I shall repent,
I shall mourn her when I've ruined her, when my present rage is spent.

Mabel Durham, rage no longer fresh when death shakes my frame;
There is yet a passion stronger, which I do not care to name.
Deeper in its root than many which more rapidly by malice
Mabel, between me and Annie falls the shadow of a grave!

Ellen Vaughan, her rank forgetting, promised to become my bride;
Every night she sits in setting saw me whisper-ing by her side—
Whispering 'mid her golden tresses, whispering in her trellised ear.
Ah! those days with memory blesses. Ah! those days so dark and dear!

Loved we with a love to holy, so intense and so entire,
Jealousy engressed but slowly, when she tried to thin its fire;
We were heart and heart together, love was unto love reviewed,
Hate thou marked the summer weather specked by but one fleecy cloud?

That small cloud was Annie's raising. Ere its influence passed away,
I had marked Nell's bright eye glazing, saw her form turn to clay—
She who would have fronted danger, learned at gossips' breath to pale,
She herself to death a stranger, sank beneath the slanderer's tale.

Pale and feble then they called me, lightly wooing, lightly won;
Every woman's eye enthralled me, but my heart was caught by none;
I had preferred vows to many, whom I since had met with scorn;
I had whispered love to Annie, when while pledged to Ellen Vaughan!

Lies revealed, and Ellen fallen! I was absent. When I return,
But her closing eyes sprinkled, scarce a word to soothe, could frame;
All the sad was meek and loving, prayer that sin might be forgiven.
Not a sentence of reproving—peace on earth and hope in Heaven.

Ellen died, and then I learned it—learned what still the public fuel!
Anger in my memory burned it, stamped it there in words of fire!
Over her given detection, swift discovery of the hand
Which had marked my life's affection, which my death in life had planned.

Soon I knew my false accuser; Mabel, now you know her too.
Think you, e'en let you should love her, I could ev'r your sister woo?
Vengeance I've foresworn; but never, to the last, will I forgive you.
Could I venture to forgive her, dream of making her my wife!

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 17, 1859.

NORTH AND SOUTH.

HALF the troubles of mankind have arisen from misunderstandings. There is just now some small danger that a misunderstanding may engender trouble between the North and the South. Each section of the country misunderstands the other. Each is excited and disposed to be angry; and if an opportunity offers, there may be a quarrel between them before a candid and friendly mutual explanation and candid interchange of opinion.

The South imagines that the Northern people sympathize with John Brown. They resented him as a martyr. Among others, Governor Wise, of Virginia, and Governor Gist, of South Carolina, interpret, and endeavor to misrepresent this opinion. Yet it is a notorious fallacy.

The bulk of the Northern people have no sympathy whatever with John Brown. They regard him as a man who broke his country's laws willfully, who caused the death of innocent men, and who has been justly punished for his crimes. This is the view taken by the great conservative body of the Northern people, including most of the merchants, farmers, mechanics, and citizens generally. Members of the Republican party—while owning to some tenderness for them on account of his sincerity and manliness—still admit that he was rightly punished. Of those who deem him a martyr, and execrate Virginia for her execution of the law, there is a mere handful—Theodore, Emerson, Phillips, and a select party of radical abolitionists, who have been long and deservedly the light of civilization, it can not be read beyond the immediate circle of its writers. Kerry-body's Journal is just as insipid. A relative of the great Fonblanque writes for it—poor fellow.

We imagine that Thackeray's Magazine, Once a Week, and All the Year Round will be, for a time at least, the crack periodicals of England. All their best matter and illustrations will appear in Lauren's WEEKLY—in most cases in advance of its arrival by mail from Great Britain.

The English periodical publishers labor under difficulties which are unknown here. There, a line is clearly drawn between the educated classes and the masses which are not educated. The latter buy 500,000 of the London Journal—a more silly publication than which it were difficult to conceive. The former buy 10,000 or 20,000 of Once a Week—no more. Here we have no such distinction. The public buy 90,000 of HARPER'S WEEKLY, and 90,000 probably will want twice as many. The matter which is beyond the appreciation of the uneducated classes of England is just suited to our farmers, mechanics, and merchants; and when well sifted, is well worth their reading. It is just so with books. When a publisher is considering a book in England, the question which he debates is—how will Mudie like it? Mudie, the great circulating-library owner, whose verdict is final, whose favor is success, whose frown is ruin. We have no Mudie here, thank God! Our publishers are in our own hands, and look to the great public alone for support. Hence, a work like Macaulay's History, which sells 50,000 to 60,000 in England, is scattered broadcast over this country—200,000 copies sold in a few months. The time is coming when we shall retort Sydney Smith's query with a sweep-ance.

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE AURORA.

To the Editor of Harper's Weekly:

NEW YORK, December, 1859.

THE communication respecting the aurora australis does not discard the possibility of it being simultaneous with the borealis. Difference of date might be due only to the observations being made at different periods of the phenomenon. Perhaps, being the subject of your paper, if you were to ask a few questions to all observers in both hemispheres, the answers would, doubtless, be scrutinized by more than one student of nature.

What is the earliest date of each appearance? Which way did each move the magnetic needle? What colors and shapes were predominant in each? Which were or not the electric currents run on North-South and East-West telegraphic wires of each hemisphere?

Perhaps the answers would tend to establish that both auroras were a single manifestation of the electric state of the earth; both poles being loaded with opposite fluids, and the current passing one way through the earth and the other through the atmosphere.

F. G. C.

THE LOUNGER.

WASHINGTON IRVING.

THE news of Irving's death did not surprise those who knew how gradually but surely life had been failing for several months; and yet the death of any one we love, however long expected, is sudden at last—and he was the one man whom the whole country loved. Men of greater genius, of more persuasive and brilliant power, were more popularly identified than he with characteristic American development—but no one had love, pride, not no character since Washington so symmetrical, and no career more rounded and complete.

With living the man and the author were one. The same twinkling humor, untouched by personal venom; the same sweetness, gentility, and grace in the same transparency and childlike simplicity which endeared the writer to his readers endeared the man to his friends. Of that rare and happy temperament, with that cheerful balance of thought and feeling which begets the sympathy that prevents bitter animosity, he lived through the sharpest struggles of our politics, not without interest but without bitterness, and with the tenderest respect of every party.

His tastes, and talents, and habits were all those of the literary man. In earlier life Secretary of Legation in London, and afterward Minister to Spain, he used the opportunities of those posts not for personal advancement, nor for any political object whatever, but for pure literary advantage. And it was given to him, first of any author, to invest the American landscape with the charm of imaginative and traditional associations. He did not evoke this spell from the grave chronicles of religious zeal in New England, whose gloomy romance Hawthorne has wielded with such power weird, nor from the gay cavalier society of Virginia, but from the element of romantic interest which seemed the least promising of all—the Dutch.

So great is the power and so exquisite the skill with which this was done, that his genius has colored history. We all see the Dutch as Irving painted them. When we speak of our doughty Governor Stuyvesant, whom we all know, we mean not the Governor of the histories, but of Diedrich Knickerbocker. And so the entire Hudden River, from Communipaw, upon the Jersey shore of the Bay, along the Highlands and beyond the Catskill, owes its characteristic romance to the touch of the same imagination.

That this power should have been no less in the treatment of Spanish legend shows its genuine quality as high, poetic imagination. That the same man should have written the Knickerbocker History, Rip Van Winkle, and Ichabod Crane, and then the Chronicles of the Alhambra and the Legends of Granada, shows only that if his power were versatile, it was versatile not because it was talent, but genius.

And to this various excellence he added the essential treasure of the Dutch and Spanish—for we must add that he was not less fortunate in the English. The humorous and pathetic sketches are the most exquisite pictures of characteristic English life in literature. What they delineate is constantly implied in the English works, but nowhere else is it so affectionately and fully elaborated. It is the quaintness of the English character which Bull, which is the secret charm of these books. They are full of a breezy heartiness, an unsophisticated benevolence, a hearty enjoyment of comfort in themselves interesting, the flower and beauty of the environment of the most solid and substantial of it all through the Spectator and the Tatler and the early essayists; in Goldsmith, too; but nowhere else in English literature so long and so fully. Irving's words, and then in the Christmas chapters of Dickens, and generally in the fictions of the latter writer.

Is it too fanciful to find this sympathy with the genius to national individuality in Irving's history? It certainly is evident in the method and atmosphere of the Columbus, as contrasted with that of the Mahomet.

It is fair to lay the more stress upon this, because Irving's genius suffers in public estimation from the author's desire to vary his subjects. Disproportion gives an impression of strength, but Irving's genius was not so much versatile as it was Grecian, although the Egyptian architecture looks as if erected in the earth, and the Grecian as if roofed by a flood of sunlight. So in any of the direction the ardent, passionate temperament seems to be more pronounced than the balanced and serene.

How Irving had grown into the public heart and life! It was like the love of England for Walter Scott. He used Knickerbocker, in his own name, had scarcely less vogue than the used Waverley, and was as every year more and more the fashion of a day but the habit of love and reverence. And so, fascinating that immortality of affection in which he was content to be identified, his many and various tasks fulfilled, his great style perfected, his fame secured, he lived and entirely unspoiled by the world which he loved and which loved him, the good old man died as quietly as he had lived—the sweetest and the struggle from the world to which he had never found the way entirely closed against him.

And when his death was known, there was no class of men who more sincerely deplored him than the men of his profession. The newspaper writer, that a friend, not a rival, the younger that a father, the humble that a friend but the honorable that a peer in the country who, if he ever personally met Irving, did not hear from him the kindest words of praise, regard, and encouragement. There is not none of the older rank who, knowing him, did not feel himself privileged to say closely, and from his own profession more than in any other of the great interests of life; and that not by any willful indulgence of personal or professional self-esteem, but by the natural catholicity of his nature.

On the day of his burial, unable to reach Tarrytown in time for the funeral, I came down the shore of the river in the cars. As we rushed rapidly along the Catskill were draped in sober gray mist, but hiding their wild wrestling and taking and lingering, as if the hills were hung with sympathetic, but not unrelaxed, gloom. Yet far away the sunlight still fell, and the sky was cloudless. It was Sunnyside still, for the sky was cloudless and the world unsympathetic, and I could not understand how his last words to me more than a year ago, when his book was finished and his health was failing, "I am going to rest now, and I shall not look up my doors and windows." And I could not but feel that they were all open and brightened with the light of eternal morning.

ADVERTISING.

ONE of the great advantages of the foreign illustrated papers is their representation of the most excellent contemporary works of art in sculpture and painting. As we have often said, they are valuable for many years mainly for its wood-cuts of famous pictures. But the Illustrated and the leading English artists own a great deal of their merited popularity to the immense dispersion among the hosts of English of representations of their works. So well is this understood that none of the best men of that school of art disdain to have be engraved, and not infrequently defray the expense of the engraving.

We have had very frequent activity in every department as ours, what an artist wants is not the opportunity of working, but of working and living upon his known. He paints his great picture in vain, both for emolument and reputation, if nobody sees it. Engraving is, of course, the best method to put the fact upon a wall and advertise it in a newspaper. But the art of advertising is achieved in those places in the hands of the public a picture with picture with an adequate description.

The most effective form of advertising is obvious paper, which is a pictorial history of the times. It depicts the men, the inventions, the fashions, the natural objects, events, statues, and pictures, in which the world happens for the time to be interested. But to do this faithfully and fairly there must be conscientiousness action. To run through a gallery and to sketch hasty remiss comes which are roughly engraved, is merely to caricature and burlesque pictures, not to represent them. And the artist is the sufferer as well as the public.

It is, therefore, in every way in the interest of both that the artist should himself authorize the illustration of his work. He need not fear that it will turn the edge of public desire to see it. The request of a good specter or lecture stimulates, it does not satisfy. A faithful engraving of Palmer's statue of the White Captive, for instance, would illustrate and extend the knowledge of it a hundredfold, and send a score of persons to see it for every one who now goes. We hope sincerely that our artists will gradually come to see this. It a man works for the pleasure of working, he may be, as Irving says, happy; but he is not a very practical. For nature has made the desire of recognition—in other words, the love of influence—an integral element of creative genius. The poet, the orator, the artist, naturally seek an audience, and the public is the audience. He who has any thing to say in any way wants a "fit" audience, but no man wishes for a mob, as it should be "fewest." He wishes to make any man his messenger of truth or beauty to other men, he does not inspire him to remain alone like a dream, but to take a trumpet in one hand and a mirror in the other and go out in the world. It is the duty of the public to raise his voice so that the blindest may see and the deafest hear.

All this is clearly accomplished by advertising. That is to say, advertising introduces a man to the world, and gives it a chance of appreciation if it be worthy. And of all advantageous advertising that which we have been discussing is the most signal.

RECITATION.

THERE is a story which turns up every few weeks in the newspapers that Lord Brougham remarked upon Mr. Everett's many orations upon the Washington, that he was told that it was the ways the same one he was incredulous, and could not understand how he could repeat the same discourse a hundred times.

The same wonder is often expressed about a lecture. "How can a man recite it so incessantly? Why doesn't he get tired to death of it? How it must fatigue him!" says you! There are lectures which have been doing duty in the lyceum for ten years yearly. You think it is incredible? But the explanation is simple: the lecture is just as new to the audience that hears it for the first time to night as it was to the audience that heard it for the first time three thousand nights ago.

As for the speaker himself, every new audience is a new lecture. His attention is so fixed upon it his thought and study upon the subject, it is my that it is to him a new topic of vital interest, or if it is his careful criticism of a literary theme, he says it as earnestly to the last audience as he is to the first. It is like singing a song which you chose to sing, and which every body likes to hear. To speak of repetition as if it emerged from the north of the soul is a great mistake. What is Mr. Everett's hundredth delivery of his Washington to a thousand and first but the hundredth singing of the discourse? He publishes his work by his mental faculties by printing-press—that is all. So the new thousand hearers are the new thousand covers.

Besides, as a master of fact, an oration is probably a hundred times better upon the hundredth delivery than the first. A fine orator is a very fine examinate work of art. Cicero wisely said that you should find a great poet oftener than a great orator. For great discourse, they carefully correct, prepare it at home in your study, or in your mind and memory, is finally completed only by constant use in the audience. It is struck completely out only in the white heat of perfect rapport between writer and reader. For an orator is not only an essay elaborately written, committed, and characterly spoken; he is not a "leader," nor a "speech," nor a "paper;" it is really a "speech." It is the utterance of a mind full of a subject of a fervent interest, so thoughtfully studied, so clearly and crisply spoken, so fused and lighted and fired with emotion, that every body palpably feels that. Eloquence is thought distilled through the heart. Its fountain may be in the head, but it is not an overpowering stream, sweeping over and away, until it has flowed through the heart.

You may learn to be eloquent when you can learn how to be gracefully: how to be beautiful, or how to write poetry.

Such is the theory of the speech, but it is effective in the degree that it approaches it. A lecture is constantly polished, trimmed, and balanced by practice. Probably not one of the more popular Lyceum lectures is delivered just as it was written the first of them probably very different, some entirely so. It is prepared in the study with the audience in mind, and then it is finished there.

But it is meant for rapid hearing, and the author finds that he must change his cabinet work to a free-and-easy talk before he finds a large, generous hand, so that the intention and scope may be seen at a distance.

It may would be a great misfortune if one city should not see a beautiful picture or statue because it had already seen in another. Fortunately the case is precisely the same with a discourse: although the excellent Baron of Brougham and YAKE may be unable to see it.

OPEN THE DOOR!

THE difficulty is—it is universal—that there are not enough doors. In case of alarm the people could not get out. There would be a panic, a crush, mad horror, and trampling under foot, from what is called "a wag" might cause it all by crying "fire!" It might be only what is called "a practical joke."

For we are speaking of the Public Hall, you know, in your town, in every town in the country. It is filled once a week with your most valuable citizens, and when any thing does happen—!

A week or two since in Utica, the handsome Mechanics' Hall did take fire. There was immense alarm, but immediate order. The audience partly returned, and the lecture went on; but there by the position of a speaker addressing a crowd which was all nerves to the slightest touch of fright; fancy a audience listening to a discourse, and wondering whether they were to get out of it alive!

Last year, in Providence, the Howard Hall, a beautiful room, holding perhaps two thousand people, took fire. It was in the second story of a building used for furniture storing and manufacture. In ten minutes the entry was thick with smoke. The audience in the hall was unaccompanied that evening; but it been otherwise, what a tragedy, wailing almost every family in the city!

Is there any impossibility in the making of doors? Are we to go to meetings and lectures only upon peril of a fearful catastrophe? In New Bedford they have been discussing the question. Many people decline to go to the Lyceum there, lest some alarm should be given, in which case there would be no means of egress for the audience. So in Philadelphia; what a handsome and pleasant hall it is, successful! There is nothing like it in Boston to compare with it. Hall, do you call it? Why not trap? In Boston the Music Hall and Tremont Temple are not built with provision. There is not sure destruction of life in either of them.

The people of this country are not to submit to these things; and they ought to help them by having the great hall of the city the property of the city. Then the inside of egress would fall largely upon every citizen, and the building could be conducted with proper means of egress. It should be understood that it would be a municipal expense, for no hall pays as a private enterprise. There is not a town in the country that does not easily put up a simple hall, well-lighted, well-ventilated, and well-warmed. It would be a small matter of a private hall who would not increase the value of his property by providing a better egress than the present has at present.

Let us have doors enough, and keep them ready to open, and the knowledge that they are so would prevent a panic.

"TALE OF TWO CITIES"

THE new story of Dickens with which the readers of Harper's Weekly have just parted company, and with which he has increased the fame of the critical, All the Year Round, has fully justified the expectation editorially expressed in this paper concerning its publication. It is not a story of story, but quite unlike any other of the great novelist's. It is remarkable entirely in fact, not in the characters. There is scarcely one of the characters who has furnished literature or common conversation with a new phrase or native of fun, but they move about spectrally in the lurid glare of a revolutionary conflagration.

It is one of the gloomiest tales in our literature; and as a picture of the horrors of the Reign of Terror it is unsurpassed, unsurpassable. Dickens, and, upon the whole, not even Carlyle's great drama, so accurately and so vividly as he, could have been the aspect and sentiment of that bloody time. Throughout Carlyle's history there is evident the Scotch humor tracing cause and effect, a kind of psycho-surgical loathsome, so to speak, skin of the "beautiful fracture" feeling of the operating-room.

Dickens, indeed, represents the Monsieur who stood by and heard the Reign of Terror. He does not lose truly show the devilishness of the devil, but does try to give a full and charitable excuse the crime of the one by that of the other.

The "Tale of Two Cities" is a triumph in a new field, and yet unexpectedly a triumph. It proves also with tragic intensity through scenes of which the very name is a disfavor terror, how, in the midst the tenderest touches; and in the character of Sydney Carton a plea for the essential heroism of a person whose life is now and habitually. Except in some of the earlier chapters, there is none of the peculiar humor of Boz. But the pathetic side of the singular fertility of his genius can be gained than by remembering that the author of the "Tale of Two Cities" is also the author of the "Pickwick Papers."

The story that replaces that of Dickens in these pages—Mr. Collins's "Woman in White"—already reveals the singular dramatic power and skillful plot-invention for which he has gained so wide a reputation.

THE LOUNGER'S LETTER-BOX.

—MADGE. Whatever you write will be carefully considered, and will always be put to you if it is fit for publication that you shall expect payment. "Friends" are very dangerous editors. They are generally more hurtful than "foes" when they write about "contributions."

—E. M. The poem is respectfully declined. It begins with "Beautiful midnight hour," but beautiful adjectives are essential. If you were to write a poem upon "Beautiful midnight hour," you would say, "I was sorrel horse!" Don't be afraid. Send again. Remember that though you know some E. B. Shillings, you don't know us.

—R. C. W. We suppose that you must resort to the "Nepenthe" of the giant bouser somebody does not like your verses. The Lounger, for instance, finds "Night Watching" very well. But do you care to write poetry very well? If you think it is better than very well, you will write on, and you will do right to writing. But you must learn to come better purpose than a splash on the wall. If you can't be a poet perhaps you can, you can be a bonnet, useful man.

—A. N. Your poem is decidedly too staccato. Of course it is worth while to try again. You shall be heartily welcome.

—R. C. T. writes from Laredo, Texas, to ask if there be any instrument invented to find gold or silver coin underground. None that we know of, but pick-axes shovels, and bean. And even those, although admirable instruments, have never yet been able to discover Captain Kidd's treasure.

—A. N. Your poem, "Before the Play," is much too imperfect in execution for print. But it is a striking imagery, although requiring extraordinary skill in the handling. It is not impossible that you may have done it. The strain to express the transcription is too evident.

HON. FERNANDO WOOD, MAYOR ELECT OF NEW YORK.

THE recent contest for the Mayoralty of this city has attracted so much attention throughout the country that people will generally be glad to see the features of the successful candidate, Mayor Wood.

Fernando Wood is a Philadelphian by birth. His ancestry, on his father's side, were Quakers; Henry Wood, the American ozeme of the family, was driven out of New England by the pleasant persecutions of the Puritans, and forced to seek a new home on the banks of the Delaware. Benjamin Wood, the father of our Mayor, was a dry-goods merchant in Philadelphia and here, but he was neither successful in business nor blessed with good health. He died young, leaving his family unprovided for. Young Fernando Wood, who was born in 1812, threw himself upon the world and his own resources at the age of thirteen, deeming himself a man when he had succeeded in obtaining a salary of three dollars a week. He fought his way steadily, as a merchant, as a clerk, as a cigar-maker, as a ship-owner, as what not, till one day he was elected, during the famous hard-cider campaign, to a seat in Congress. There he made the acquaintance, and won the esteem of such men as John Quincy Adams and Henry Clay, both of whom foretold for the youth an unusually brilliant career. One anecdote of Mr. Wood's intercourse with Henry Clay may be worth preserving.

Walking together down Pennsylvania Avenue one day, they entered a cigar-store together. In an inner room they noticed, while they were making their purchases, three or four men busily engaged in the manufacture of cigars. Mr. Clay's attention was attracted, and he drew his companion into the room, desiring him to remark the skill and sleight-of-hand with which these mechanics performed their work. Mr. Wood, rather to the surprise of the great Kentuckian, replied that he saw nothing wonderful in what they did—that the business was easy enough. The cigar-makers and their employer looked up indignantly; Mr. Clay—imputing his companion's remark to ignorance—challenged him instantly to perform the work he derided, adding that he would better appreciate the difficulty when he had tried the business and failed.

"Oh!" said Wood, "I could certainly make cigars, I think."

"Let us see you at it, then," replied Mr. Clay, impatiently.

The workmen and their employer, eager to have their laugh at a member of Congress, were equally pressing; and after some feigned reluctance, Mr. Wood drew off his gloves and sat down at the table. With practised hand he seized a leaf, cut it into the right shape, and proceeded to roll: in less time than the most expert workman would have required to perform the feat he made an excellent cigar, which he gracefully presented to Mr. Clay.

The laugh was now against the great Senator, who acknowledged that young Wood was a smart fellow—little dreaming that he had for several years made a living by cigar-making.

In Congress Mr. Wood's career was respectable. Several of his speeches attracted attention, and his practical ability called forth general remark. At the close of his Congressional term he returned to this city, and embarked in business with the usual varying results. In November, 1854, he was nominated Democratic candidate for the mayoralty, and, after a sharp contest, was elected over three rival candidates, representing the Whig, Know Nothing, and Reform interests. He was again re-elected at the close of his term, after a contest of still greater severity.

At the election in 1857 he again ran as the Democratic candidate against Daniel F. Tiemann, who was supported by the combined opposition and a portion of the Democracy. The contest was exceedingly sharp, and Wood was defeated by a few thousand votes. He has now retrieved himself, and is once more mayor of New York. Let us hope that he will so administer the office as to regain the popularity he once enjoyed.

HON. FERNANDO WOOD, MAYOR ELECT OF NEW YORK.

A SKETCH IN ALABAMA.

LONG years ago, when the now populous State of Alabama was an almost uninterrupted wilderness, the region of country now comprised in the county of Randolph was infested with wolves, and stocked with game of every kind.—It was a very common thing for companies of men to go from the older settled county of Chambers up to Randolph county, for the purpose of "camp-hunting," and it is with one of these expeditions that we now have to do.

In the fall of 1837 four men left the village of Lafayette, and bent their course to a place among the hills of Randolph, known as the White Oak Mountain, a place where game of all kinds abounded. Just about the line dividing the two counties there was a little one-horse grocery, kept by one Redmon Hornsby, or, as he was usually called by his associates, "Redhorn." His principal characteristics were an inordinate love of whisky, fear of wolves and Indians, and an unquenchable desire to swindle every body in any manner that presented itself. This is description enough for the present.

Calling at his grocery, the crew concluded to take Redhorn along, partly to amuse themselves with his eccentricities, and partly because he wanted to go. The camping-ground was reached about nightfall, and as it was too late to hunt any that evening, they built up a fire, prepared supper, and set about enjoying themselves. A pack of greasy cards was produced, but one of the boys declined to enter into the game.

"Here, Redhorn," said Ben Walker, "there's but three of us to play; take a hand with us."

"Who? me!" said Redhorn, who had been intently watching the proceedings, "I don't know no more about them cussed things than I do about the twelve Apostles!"

"Oh, nonsense," said Ben, "you certainly know something about it."

"Durned if I know one keard from t'other," persisted he.

"Well, come on, you can soon learn," urged Ben.

"No," said Redhorn, "you three do it a while, cotwel I sorter git the hang of it, and then I'll give you a turn."

Accordingly they played a few games without any bets, until Redhorn thought he "seed into it."

"Now, boys," said Ben, winking at the others, "give me and Redhorn three in seven, and we'll try you for half-dollar a game."

This was agreed to, and at it they went. As may be supposed, Ben and Red lost all the time, the latter cursing all the time, and swearing it was no better than stealing "to take a feller's money that-a-way, an' be not know a thing about the game." But they thought differently.

At length Red appeared very much excited, and, rising to his feet, broke out,

"You've made a bargain to cheat me out'n my money, an' I'll be cussed of I stand it! You jest hud Ben on my side to help you, an' I'll be durned of I can't beat the best of you, even pop. Come shed, of you want the silver jerked out o' ye by hatfuls."

"I'm your man," said Joe Blount, and pulling out his money they went at it, the bet being raised to a dollar a game. It soon became evident to Joe that he had caught a Tartar. None of his tricks would succeed, while Redhorn was continually "raking down the pile." After playing about an hour Joe found himself minus a stake, and threw down the cards with an oath.

"These is curious fixens," said Red, as he viewed them one at a time. "I'll bet five dollars I kin turn Jack, as you call it, the fust pop."

"Done!" said Ben, pulling out the money, "let me shuffle 'em."

The cards were duly shuffled, and handed back to Red, who carelessly took off a few and turned up the bottom one for Ben's inspection.

It was the Jack of Spades!

"Confound you!" said Ben, handing over a V, "you've seen cards before."

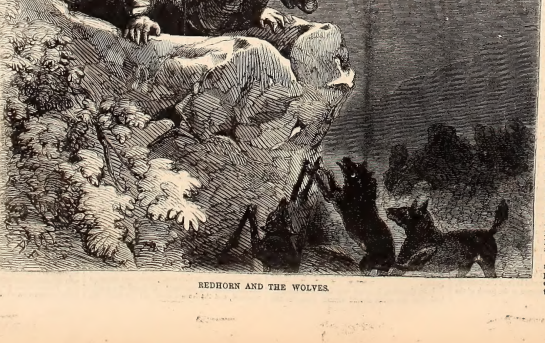
"This is a queer world," said Red, throwing up and catching a dollar; "the quarest world I ever lit onto. Here's you three fellers been tryin' three hours to swindle me, an' I've worn out more keards than you ever seed, by a durned sight! When you want to larn another green hand, jest invite me, will you?"

This avowal vexed them not a little; they discovered that the biters had got bitten, and that in their endeavors to cheat Redhorn out of his money they had "waked up the wrong man," and, as is usual in such cases, they determined to be revenged on him. Professing to be very well satisfied with the turn affairs had taken, they prepared themselves for sleep, telling Red to hold himself in readiness, as they were going out before daylight next morning to kill some turkeys. As soon as he was asleep Ben got Redhorn's shoes and rubbed the soles of them with assfetida, a substance which will attract wolves from an almost incredible distance.

A little after midnight they aroused Red, and together they set off to find the turkeys. When they were out of sight of the camp Joe proposed that they should separate.

"Now, Red," said he, "you go right up this holler, and about a quarter of a mile from here you will come to a cliff of rocks; take your stand there, and you'll be sure to shoot a turkey."

Following his instructions, the unsuspecting Redhorn set out, and soon reached the proposed "stand."



REDHORN AND THE WOLVES.

It was a wild-looking place; on the south, west, and north the hills and rocks rose in towering masses, completely shutting out the light of the moon, and giving a dark and somber aspect to the place.

"I'll be eternally blessed if I like this place," said he, gazing around at the prospect. "Now I don't like it a bit; but, howsomever, it'll soon be day, and then I can leave it." So saying, he seated himself on a projecting rock, laid his gun across his knees, and prepared to make himself comfortable. His reveries were soon interrupted, however, by observing in the valley below him what appeared to be a large dog, and which seemed to be scenting his track.

"What on airth is the dogs a-follerin' me for, I wonder?" he said, with some misgivings; but he had hardly ceased speaking when he heard a howl far below him which was not to be mistaken.

"Wolves, by Gemini!" he exclaimed, jumping to his feet. "I'll be eat up, sure as frost. But I'll settle you, you black cuss!" And leveling his gun, he fired at the one, which was now only a few thirty paces of him. The animal fell with a savage yell, but the roar of his gun was answered by terrific howls on every side.

"Golly! what'll I do?" he exclaimed, dropping his gun, which rebounded from rock to rock, and fell some distance below him. But he had no time to recover it, for his quick-hearing enemies were close upon him; and he scrambled up the almost perpendicular face of the rock, and secured a seat higher up. On looking down he saw several more of the ravenous animals coming at full speed up the valley, guided by the potent drug which he unknowingly carried about him. Arriving at the foot of the rock they set up fearful yells, and attempted to reach him, but he was not too high.

"Now I'll be darned if I like this," soliloquized Redlhorn, gazing down in great trepidation. "If the black devils, that's at least a dozen of 'em, and more a-comin'. What on airth are they a-follerin' me for, I wonder? Ugh! you black, devil! quit jumpin' up here! He was like to have me that time. I'll be eat up as sure as God made Moses. I wish I could pray; I've a notion to try it, anyhow. Ugh! the varmints! The woods is full of 'em. O Lord, now hide thy servant— don't look how they come! that's at least a hundred. Why didn't old Deacon Hornsby larn me how to pray? I wish he was here; cuss me if I didn't pitch him off right among 'em. Now may the saving grace —I'll swar I can't pray, and they come thicker an' thicker. O Lord, deliver thy servant from the hands of the Philistine, and— But them new Injuns if sich pryin' as that 'll win. The devil 'll cuss a jumpin' arter me, and the wolves won't let me pray a lick. I wish them boys was in—no matter where—for sendin' me into sich a place. They done it a-purpose, cuss 'em; and if I had 'em here I'd pitch 'em right among the critters, neck an' heels. An' that's the long-nosed Jon Blount, he's mad 'cause I won his money; an' he got me into this fix. If I ever git back to the camp, I'll kick out what little sense he's got. Wolves I wolves!"

In this condition poor Redlhorn remained till day, when the animals left, and he made his way back to the camp. There was no one there but a negro boy, the hunters having gone out after turkeys. Redlhorn tied his sleeping African fast to a convenient sapling, and cutting the horses loose, mounted the best one, and struck a bee line for home, when he turned his horse loose. He took care, however, to make himself scarce until the hunters had returned home.

THE WOMAN IN WHITE.

By WILKIE COLLINS,

AUTHOR OF "THE DEAD SECRET," "AFTER DARK," ETC., ETC.

CHAPTER THE SECOND.

HARTRIGHT'S NARRATIVE—Continued.

VIII.

So ended my eventful first day at Limmeridge House.

Miss Halcombe and I kept our secret. After the discovery of the likeness no fresh light seemed destined to break over the mystery of the woman in white. At the first safe opportunity Miss Halcombe cautiously led her half-sister to speak of their mother, of old times, and of Anne Catherick. Miss Fairlie's recollections of the little scholar at Limmeridge were, however, only of the most vague and general kind. She remembered the likeness between herself and her mother's favorite pupil, as something which had been supposed to exist in past times, but she did not refer to the gift of the white dresses, or to the surprise and disorder it had caused. She could add nothing to the information which had already expressed her gratitude for them. She remembered that Anne had remained at Limmeridge for "a few months only, and had then left it to go back to her home in Hampshire; but she could not say whether the mother and daughter had ever returned, or had ever been heard of afterward. No further search, on Miss Halcombe's part, through the few letters of Mrs. Fairlie's writing which she had left unburned in clearing up the uncertainties still left to perplex us. We had identified the unhappy woman whom I had seen in the night-time with Anne Catherick —we had made some advance, at least, toward connecting the probable defective education of the poor creature's intellect with the peculiarity of her being dressed all in white, and with the continuance, in her manner years, of the childish gratitude toward Mrs. Fairlie—and these, so far as we knew at that time, our discoveries had ended.

"SHE WAITED A MOMENT, TURNED HER FACE FULL ON ME; AND, REACHING ACROSS THE TABLE, LAID HER HAND FIRMLY ON MY ARM."

The days passed on, the weeks passed on: and the track of the golden autumn wound its bright way visibly through the green summer to the trees. Peaceful, fast-flowing, happy time! In the story of my life I can look back on you once gilded by me. Of all the treasures of enjoyment that you poured so freely into my heart, how little is left me that has purpose and value enough to be written on this page? Nothing but the sunlight of my remembrance that a man can make—the confession of his own folly.

The secret which that confession disclosed should, I felt sure from the first, be for ever strictly escaped me already. The poor weak woman, who had been foiled to deceive Miss Fairlie, have succeeded in forcing the sensitive girl to be awakened in me. It is so with us all. Our sympathies are not to be forced to an injury, and dwarfs when they do us a service.

Feel for—

Ah! how well I know all the sadness and all the mockery that is comprised in those three words. I can sigh over my unrequited love now with the tenderest woman who reads it and pities me. I can laugh at it as bitterly as the hardest man who tosses it from him: a woman has never loved her! Feel for me, or despise me, I cannot help it. I am only writing the truth honestly on my own the truth.

Was there no excuse for me? There was some excuse to be found, surely, in the conditions under which my terms of hired service were fixed at Limmeridge House.

My morning hours succeeded each other calmly in the quiet and seclusion of my own room. I was just well employed in completing my employer's drawings, to keep my hand in practice, and was not often sent for by him (as my check, as the west together over her sketchbook, almost touching hers. The pure breath tively she watched every movement of my brush, the more closely I was breathing the perfume of her hair, and the warm fragrance of her breath. It was part of my service to live in the very light of her eyes, and one time to be kneeling over her, so close to her bosom as to breathe at the thought of touching it; at another time to bend her bending over me, bending so close to see what I was about, that her voice sank low when she spoke to me, and her ribbons brushed my cheek in the wind before she could draw them back.

The evenings which followed the sketching excursions of the afternoon varied, rather than checked, these innocent, these inevitable familiarities. My natural fondness for the music which she delighted in, with such tender feeling, my delicate womanly taste, and her natural enjoyment of giving me both, by the practice of her art, the pleasure which I had offered to her by the practice of mine, only wove another tie which drew us closer and closer to one another. The Halcombe's ever-ready raillery, always directed against my assumed mastery of her heart, and her ever-her enthusiasm as pupil; the harmless expression of poor Mrs. Vesey's drowsy approval which overcame Miss Fairlie and me as two model young people who never disturbed her—every one of these trifles, and many more, combined to fold us together in the same domestic atmosphere, and to lead us both insensibly to the same hopeless end.

I should have remembered my position, and have put myself secretly on my guard. I did so, but not till it was too late. All the direction, all the experience, which had availed me with other women, and secured me against other temptations, failed me with her. It had been my profession, for years past, to be in this close contact with young girls of all ages, and of all varieties of character. I had accepted the position as part of my calling in life: I had trained myself to leave all the sympathies natural to my age in my memory of my own youth, as easily as I left my umbrella there before I went up stairs. I had long since learned to understand, composedly and as a matter of course, that my situation in life was considered a guarantee against any of my female pupils feeling more than the most ordinary interest in me, and that I was admitted among beautiful and captivating women, much as a harmless domestic animal is admitted among them. This guardian experience I had gained, and in my guardian position had steadily and strictly guided me straight along the safe and narrow path, without once letting me stray aside to the right hand or to the left. And now, I and my trusty talisman were parted for the first time. Yes, my hardly-earned self-control was so completely lost to me as if I had never possessed it; lost to me, as it is lost every day to other men in other critical situations where women are concerned. I know now that I should have questioned myself from the first. I should have asked why any room in the house was chosen for me to see when she was absent in it, and barren as a desert when she went out again—why I always noticed and remembered the tidy change in her dress that I had noticed and remembered in no other woman's before—why I rose her, heard her, and touched her (when we shook hands at night and morning) as I had never seen, heard, and touched my other women in my life? I should have looked into my own heart, and found this new growth springing up there, and plucked it out while it was young. Why was this easiest, simplest work of self-culture always too much for me? The explanation has been written already in the three words that were many enough, and plain enough, for my confession. I loved her.

The days passed, the weeks passed; it was approaching the third month of my stay in Cumberland. The delicious monotony of life in our calm seclusion flowed on with me like a smooth stream with a murmur who glides down the current. All memory of the past, all thought of the future, all sense of the falseness and hopelessness of my own position, lay hushed within me into deceitful rest. Lulled by the siren song that my own heart sung to me, with eyes shut to all sight, and ears closed to all sound of danger, I drifted nearer and nearer to the fatal rocks. The time for awakening came at last, and startled me into sudden, self-accusing consciousness of my own weakness, was the pleasure, the treat, the kindest of all warnings, for it came silently from her.

We had parted one night, as usual. No word had fallen from my lips, at that time or at any other time, which could betray me, or startle her into sudden knowledge of the truth. But when we met again in the morning, a change had come over me—a change that told me all. I shrank then—I think still—from inviting a heartless examination of her heart, and bringing it open to others, as I have laid open my own. Let it be enough to say that the time when the first surprise in my secret was, I firmly believe, the time when she first surprised her own, and the time, also, when she changed toward me in the interval of one night. Her nature, too truthful to deceive others, was too noble to deceive itself. When the doubt that I had hushed asleep first laid its weary weight on her heart, the true face owned all, and said, in its own frank, simple language—I am sorry for him; I am sorry for myself.

It said this, and more, which I could not then interpret. I understood but too well the change in her manner, to greater kindness and quicker readiness in interpreting all my wishes, before others—to constraint and sadness, and nervous anxiety to absent herself on the first occasion she could seize on, whenever we happened to be left together alone. I understood why the sweet sensitive lips smiled so rarely and so restrainedly now; and why the clear blue eyes looked at me, sometimes with the pity of an angel, sometimes with the innocent perplexity of a child. But the change meant more than this. There was a coldness in her hand, there was an unnatural immobility in her face, there was in all her movements the mute expression of constant fear and clinging self-reproach. The resolutions that I could trace to herself and to me, the unacknowledged sensations that we were feeling in common, were not there. There were certain elements of the change in her that were still secretly drawing us together, and others that were, as secretly, beginning to drive us apart.

In my doubt and perplexity, in my vague suspicion of something hidden which I was left to find by my own unaided efforts, I examined Miss Halcombe's looks and manner for enlightenment. Living in such intimacy as ours, no serious alteration could fail to be visible in either of us which did not sympathetically affect the others. The change in Miss Fairlie was reflected in her half-sister. Although what a word escaped Miss Halcombe which hinted at an altered state of feeling toward myself; her penetrating eyes had contracted a new habit of always watching me. Sometimes she look was suppressed anger; sometimes like suppressed dread; sometimes like neither—like nothing, in short, which I could understand. A week elapsed, leaving us all three still in this position of secret constraint toward one another. My situation, aggravated by the sense of my own miserable weakness and forgetfulness of myself, was no less awakened in me, was becoming intolerable. I felt that I must cast off the oppression under which I was living, at once and forever—yet how to set for the best, or what to say first, was more than I could tell.

From this position of helplessness and humiliation I was rescued by Miss Halcombe. Her lips told me the bitter, the necessary, the unexpected truth; her hearty kindness sustained me under the shock of hearing it; her sense and courage turned to its right use an event which threatened the worst that could happen, to me and to others, in Limmeridge House.

IX.

It was on a Thursday in the week, and nearly at the end of the third month of my sojourn in Cumberland.

On the morning, when I went down into the breakfast-room, at the usual hour, Miss Halcombe met me for the first time alone. Her sister, she said, was absent from her customary place at the table.

Miss Fairlie was out on the lawn. She bowed to me, but did not come in. Not a word had passed between us, and I had been left during the tertile either of—and yet the sense was unacknowledged even in our embarrassment—made us shrink back from meeting one another alone. She waited on the lawn; and I waited in the breakfast-room, till Mrs. Vesey or Miss Halcombe came in. How quickly I should have joined her; how readily we should have shaken hands, and glided into our customary talk, only a fortnight ago!

In a few minutes, Miss Halcombe entered. She had a preoccupied look, and she made her apologies for being late, rather absently.

"I have been detained," she said, "by a consultation with Mrs. Fairlie on a domestic matter which he wished to speak to me about."

Miss Fairlie came in from the garden; and the usual morning greeting passed between us. Her head struck closer to mine than ever. She did not look at me; and she was very pale. Poor Mrs. Vesey noticed it, when she entered the room a moment after.

"I suppose it's the change in the wind," said the old lady. "The winter is coming—ah, my love, the winter is coming soon?"

In her heart and mine it had come already!

Our morning meal—once so full of pleasant good-humored discussions of the plans for the day—was short and silent. Miss Fairlie seemed to feel the oppression of the long pause in the conversation; and looked appealingly to her sister to fill them up. Miss Halcombe, after once or twice hesitating and checking herself, in a most uncharacteristic manner, spoke at last.

"I have seen your uncle, this morning, Laura," she said. "He has left the parsley bed, and is now out ought to be got ready; and he confirms what I told you. Monday is the day—not Tuesday."

While these words were being spoken, Miss Fairlie looked down at the table beneath her. Her fingers moved nervously among the crumbs that were scattered on the cloth. The paleness on her cheeks rested on her lips, and then themselves trembled visibly. I was not the only person present who noticed this. Miss Halcombe saw it, too; and at once set us the example of rising from table.

"Mr. Vesey and Miss Fairlie left the room together. The kind sorrowful blue eyes looked at me, for a moment, with the expression of a caress of a coming and a long farewell. I felt the answering pang in my own heart—the pang that told me I loved her once, and dare love her the more unchangingly for the loss.

I turned toward the garden, when the door had closed on her. Miss Halcombe was standing with her hat in her hand, and her shawl over her arm, in large window recess at the end of the room, and was looking at me attentively.

"I am about to take a leisure time to myself," she asked, "before you begin to work in your own room?"

"Certainly, Miss Halcombe. I have always time at your service."

"I want to say a word to you in private, Mr. Hartright. Get your hat, and come out into the garden. We are not likely to be disturbed there at this hour in the morning."

As we stepped out on to the lawn, one of the under-gardeners—a man labouring near—made his way to the house, with a letter in his hand. Miss Halcombe stopped him.

"Is the letter for me?" she asked.

"Nay, miss; it's just said to be for Miss Fairlie," answered the lad, holding out the letter as he spoke.

Miss Halcombe took it from him, and looked at the address.

"A strange handwriting," she said to herself. "Who can be your correspondent but me, that I did you get this?" she continued, addressing the gardener.

"Well, miss," said the lad, "I just got it from a woman."

"What woman?"

"A woman well stricken in age."

"Oh, an old woman. Any one you know?"

"I cannot tell, sure ne'myself to say that she was other than a stranger to me."

"Which way did she go?"

"That gate," said the under-gardener, turning with great deliberation toward the south, and embracing the whole of that part of Blackland with one comprehensive sweep of his arm.

"Curious," said Miss Halcombe; "I suppose it must be a begging-letter. There," she added, handing the letter back to the lad, "take it to the house, and give it to one of the servants. And now, Mr. Hartright, if you have no objection, let us walk this way."

She led me across the lawn, along the same path by which I had followed her on the night after my arrival at Limmeridge. At the little summer-house in which Laura Fairlie and I had first seen each other, she stopped, and broke the silence which she had steadily maintained while we were walking together.

"What I have to say to you I can say here." She seated herself, as she entered the summer-house, took one of the chairs at the little round table beside, and signed to me to take the other. I had scarcely done so, when the man who had spoke to me in the breakfast-room; I felt certain of it now.

"Mr. Hartright," she said, "I am going to begin by making a frank avowal to you. I am going to say—without phrase-making, with a deliberation which I heartily despise—that I have come, for the first time since I have been under your residence with us, to feel a strong friendly regard for you. I was predisposed in your favor when you were told me of your conduct toward that unhinged woman whom you met under such remarkable circumstances. Your management of the affair might not have been prudent; but it showed the self-control, the delicacy, and the compassion of a man who was naturally a gentleman. It made me expect good things from you; and you have not disappointed my expectations."

She paused—and held up her hand at the same time, as a sign that she wished to prevent me from me before she proceeded. When I entered the summer-house, no thought was in me of the woman in white. But, now, Miss Halcombe's own words had put the memory of my adventure back in my mind. It remained there, through-out the interview—remained, and not without a result.

"As your friend," she proceeded, "I am going to tell you, at once, in my own plain, blunt, downright language, that I have discovered your secret—without help or hint, mind, from any one else. Mr. Hartright, you have thoughtlessly allowed yourself to form an affectionate admiration and devoted attachment, I am afraid—to my sister Laura. I don't put you to the pain of confessing it, in so many words, because I see and know that you are too honest to deny it. I don't even blame you—I say that you have long your heart to a hopeless affection. You have not attempted to take any underhand advantage—you have not spoken to my sister in secret. You are guilty of weakness and want of attention to your own interests, in relying on your discretion. If you had acted, in any single respect, less delicately and less modestly, I should have told you to leave the house without any further notice, or an instant's consultation of any body. As it is, I know you will not force your eyes and your position—I don't blame you. Shake hands—I have given you pain; I am going to give you more. Shake hands for that, for—shake hands with your friend, Marian Halcombe, first."

The sudden kindness—the warm, high-minded, fearless sympathy which met me on such unexpected grounds—the delicate tenderness with such delicate and generous promptness straight to my heart, honor, and my virtue at Limmeridge House was her future husband. I tried to face it back; but something rose within me at that moment stronger than my own will; and I interrupted Miss Halcombe.

"Let me go—day," I said, bitterly. "The sooner the better."

No; not to-day," she replied. "The only reason your wishing to resign Mr. Fairlie for your departure, before the end of your engagement, must be that an unforeseen necessity compels you to ask his permission to return at once to London. You must wait till to-morrow to tell him that; or he will think you have chosen its because he will then understand the sudden change in your plans, by associating it with the arrival of a letter from London. It is unkind, and sickening to descend to deceit, even of the most trivial kind; but you and I know Mr. Fairlie, and if you once excite his suspicions that you are trifling with him, he will refuse to release you. Speak to him on Friday morning; accuse yourself afterward (for the sake of your own interests with your employer) of having awkwardly asked work in as little confusion as possible; and quit his place on Saturday. It will be time enough then, and you will be free, and for all of us."

Before I could assure her that she might depend on my acting in the strictest accordance with her wishes, we were both startled by advancing footsteps in the shrubbery. Some one was coming from the house to seek for us! It was the letter which had put me, and which had left me, in my own power. Could the third person who was fast approaching us, at such a time and under such circumstances, be Miss Fairlie?

It was a relief—so sadly, so hopelessly was my position changed—that the changed mind—it was absolutely a relief to me, when the person who had disturbed us appeared at the entrance of the summer-house. It had proved to be only Miss Fairlie's maid.

"I could speak to you for a moment, Miss?" said the girl, in rather a flurried, unsettled manner.

Miss Halcombe descended the steps into the shrubbery, and walked aside a few paces with the maid.

Left by myself, my mind reverted, with a sense of forlorn wretchedness which it is not in my words that I can find to describe, to my approaching return to the solitude and the despair of my lonely chambers at home. Deceptive by my kind old mother, and of my sister, who had rejoiced with her so innocently over my prospects in Cumberland—my own folly, my own blindness, ment from my heart it was now my shame and my reproach to realize for the first time—came back to me with a force that the mournfulness of neglected friends. My mother and my sister, what would they think when I returned to them from my broken engagement, with the confession of my miserable secret—they who had parted from me so hopefully on that last bright night in the Hampstead cottage?

Aunt Clarke's legacy—even the memory of the farewell evening with my mother and my sister could not return to me now, unconnected with that other memory of the hemisphere which back to London. What did it mean? Were that woman and I to meet once more? It was possible, at the least. Did she know that I lived in London? Yes: I had told her so, either before or after the memorable night of fears, when she had asked me so distrustfully if I knew many men of the name of Fairlie. My thoughts were in after—my mind was not calm enough, then, to remember which.

A few minutes elapsed before Miss Halcombe dismissed the maid and came back to me. Isle, looked better—more unperturbed.

"We have arranged all that is necessary, Mr. Hartright," she said. "We have understood each other. Our friends should not see me go back at once to the house. To tell you the truth, I am uneasy about Laura. She has sent to say she wants to see me directly; and the maid reports that her mistress is apparently very much agitated by a letter that she has received this morning—the same letter, no doubt, which I sent on to the house before we came here."

We retraced our steps together hastily along the shrubbery path. Although Miss Halcombe had ended all that she thought it necessary to say, on her side, I had not ended all that I wanted to say on mine. From the moment when I had discovered that the expected visitor at Limmeridge was Miss Fairlie's future husband, I had felt a bitter curiosity, a burning anxious impatience, to know what he was. It was possible that a future opportunity of putting the question might not easily offer; so I resolved asking it on our way back to the house.

"Now that we are long enough to tell me we have understood each other, Miss Halcombe," I said; "now that you are sure of my promises for your forbearance and my obedience to your wishes, may I venture to ask who?—I hesitated; I had forced myself to think of him, but it was harder still to speak of him, as her promised husband;—"who the gentleman engaged to Miss Fairlie is?"

Her mind was evidently occupied with the message she had received from the maid, for she answered, in a hasty, absent way:

"A gentleman of large property, in Hampshire."

Hampshire! Anne Catherick's native place. Again, and yet again, the woman in white. There was a fatality in it.

"And his name?" I said, as quietly and indifferently as I could.

"Sir Percival Glyde."

Sir—Sir Percival! Anne Catherick's question—that suspicious question about the men of title—flashed across my mind when I might inquire to know—had hardly been dismissed from my mind by Miss Halcombe's return to me in the summer-house, before its re-appearance gave me her own answer. I stopped suddenly, and looked at her.

"Sir Percival Glyde," she repeated, imagining that I had not heard her former reply.

"Knight, or Baronet?" I asked, with an appearance of being in my usual mind.

She paused for a moment, and then answered, rather coldly:

"Baronet, sir."

LITERARY

We are informed that the talented Miss Martha Haines Butt, of Virginia, is about to publish a work of fiction, entitled "Antonio Mucarro," the hero of who is only twenty, and is as lovely as she is gifted, has lately received the compliment of a degree of A.M. from the Harrisburg Female Institute. Mrs. Sigourney is, we believe, the only lady who has been previously honored with it.

Fisher's River (North Carolina) Scenes and Characters, by Strut, "who was raised there," is now fairly illustrated by Nichols, and published by Harper & Brothers. The volume is a series of laughable sketches of backwoods life—a reader will not fail to recognize with shouts of delight. If any thing can add to the fun of a good story, the inimitable drawing made by Hoskins is outdo. These men, that talk the most excruciating provincialisms on the pages of the letter-press, would be unintelligible if we did not have their faces in the wood-cuts, when we can at once give them voices.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

CONGRESS.

On Monday, December 5, the Thirty-sixth Congress met in the Capitol at the City of Washington. At noon the Senate was called to order by Vice-President. Twenty-eight Senators were present. After prayer by Rev. Gurley, Senator Pearce, of Maryland, offered a resolution, which he said he would call up on the following day, for the appointment of a committee to inquire into the facts attending the late invasion and seizure of the Armory and Arsenal at Harper's Ferry by a band of armed men, and report whether the same was attended by any treasonable design to the subversion and dismemberment of the United States, and the number of any citizens of the United States who were implicated in such treasonable design; whether such invasion was against the consent or any opposition intended to subvert the laws and authority of the State of Virginia or the United States, and what steps of such organization: whether any citizens of the United States were present when lawful authority was exercised thereby for restitutions of money, arms, munitions, or otherwise; the names and residence of the individual or individuals in the hands or under the control of said armed bands when captured at the Armory and Arsenal, and transported to the place invaded; also, to report what legislation, if any, is necessary by the Government for the future preservation of the peace of the country, and the safety of property belonging to the Government no longer needed for its purposes.

Mr. Pearce said he would give notice of an amendment, to direct the Committee to report the names of all Free-Soilers, Missouri Emigrants, Abolitionists, and Republicans, who were engaged in the late affair. In order, the following gentlemen having been named for the Speakership, the vote was taken on the following result: Seerds, 86; Sherman, 66; Gross, 42; Bocock, 20; Phillips, 12; Scott, 11; Clark, 8; Corwin, 5; Cox, 1; Adams, 1; Hill, 1; Pennington, 1; Hickman, 2; Hamlin, 2; Banks, 1; Wilson, 1; Fuller, 1. The following withdrawn his name, a debate arose on a speech and the resolution proposed by Mr. Pearce, whereupon the resolutions were as follows:

Whereas, a portion of the citizens of the House, now in nomination for speaker, did indorse and recommend the book known as Helper's Impending Crisis:

Resolved, That the indorsement by a majority of a certain book, called "The Impending Crisis of the South, and How to Meet It," purporting to have been written by H. R. Helper, are incendiary, and hostile to the domestic institutions of the Southern States, and that no member of this House who commended or interested in the recommendation of said book to be worthy of this confidence.

This led to a debate in which Messrs. Clark, Florence, Winslow, Gilmer, Stanton, Pryor, Barksdale, Quitman, Talbott, and Boteler took part. Mr. Kellogg then moved to lay the whole subject on the table.

On Tuesday, December 6, in the Senate, Senator Mason moved that the Committee on Foreign Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of reporting a bill to remove Trumbull, Simon, Hall, Davis, Crittenden, Wilson, Clark, Foster, Seward, Fessenden, Doolittle, Hale, Mr. Clark's resolution was taken up. Mr. Mason, by the Senate, Foreign Affairs, Mr. Bocock, Mr. Stanton, Mr. Kellogg, Mr. Pryor, and others took part. A second ballot was then taken for Speaker with the following result: Sherman, 101; Bocock, 88; Gilmer, 24; Scattering 14.

On Thursday, 8th, in the Senate, after several notices of motions and resolutions, among which was one by Senator Bigler of a bill appropriating money to facilitate the re-gestion of Cuba, Mr. Mason's resolution was taken up, and was debated throughout the day. Speeches were made by Senators Trumbull, Yulee, Clay, Pugh, Davis, Mason, Wilson, and Johnson; but no vote was taken.—In the House, speeches, mainly on the slavery question, were made by Messrs. Davis, Martin, Morris, Cowden, Sanders, Sherman, and Cox; no vote was taken for Speaker.

On Friday, 9th, in the House, the Senate not being in session, a discussion took place between Messrs. Logan and Kellogg, referring to the course of Senator Douglas. This led to an angry altercation and to a general Southern conversation followed, in which Messrs. Hanks, Barksdale, and Gilmer took part, and Mr. Sherman and Mr. Howard, with the following result: For Sherman, 109; for Howard, 74; for Gilmer, 1; scattering, 3. There being no choice, the House then adjourned.

On Saturday, December 10, the Senate, not being in session, a conversation took place between Messrs. Hickman and Bocock, in which the latter made the subject of his remarks the speech which he had made on Friday by the latter. This was followed by an speeches on the slavery question, including those of Messrs. William Smith, Horace F. Clark, Mims, and Curry, of Alabama. On motion of John Cochrane, the House then adjourned.

INCENDIARY DOCUMENTS NOT PORTABLE.

Our readers will probably recall to mind a number of weeks ago a Virginian postmaster wrote to Governor Wise, asking information as to what the postmaster he should make of such incendiary newspapers as the Tribune, and stating that many of them had been received at his office. The letter was referred to the Attorney-General, who decided that the mail matter containing publications should be destroyed. The Richmond Enquirer had indorsed this view. He says that the people of Virginia may not agree in the interpretation of the Constitution of such documents within their borders, but, if they are brought there in the mails, they will, by the proprietor legal proceedings, have been destroyed. They have the same right to destroy incendiary matter as is piously hoarded in the midst of their homes and altars that a man has to glance his burglar with the pistol with which is about to explode at his feet.

INAUGURATION OF THE NEW GOVERNOR OF MISSISSIPPI.

Hon. John J. Pettus, the newly-elected Democratic Governor of Mississippi, was inaugurated at Jackson, with considerable pomp, on the 8th inst. In his address he declared that the people would be regarded the traitor or Harper's Ferry as a mere ruffian, and that the Black Republicans erred into practical operation. He thought it the duty of the South to "meet the issue before battle." He alluded to the fact that the anti-slavery party had undertaken the control of the governments of nearly all the non-slaveholding States, where the most inflaming appeals to the passions of the ignorant were violated, their property destroyed or stolen, and the citizens jeopardized; while the Federal Government was either unwilling or unable to guard the rights or redress the wrongs of slaveholders. He said that there was not one of their modes of making war upon the institution of slavery, which they had not practiced upon the South, and that they counted the power of the Federal Government made to prevent it from the plain purposes of its creation into an engine for the destruction of the rights of the South. Their aggressions would thus become irresistible, and we would have been living in a condition of war or slavery may put into our hands. The Black Republican party inaugurates a high-handed Civil Government as they have violated its plain provisions in the past, and he thinks the conviction that this must be done by force will be saved from destruction by the horrors at the Constitution, rising in the minds of the conservative men of the States of the Federal Government, is as safe as the prayer of the heathen to his wooden god. The only hope of peace was in the power of the united voice of the South, by which he meant that the South was to be united in what would bring peace to them, and that the only man who would preserve the Union would rally to our support even in the North.

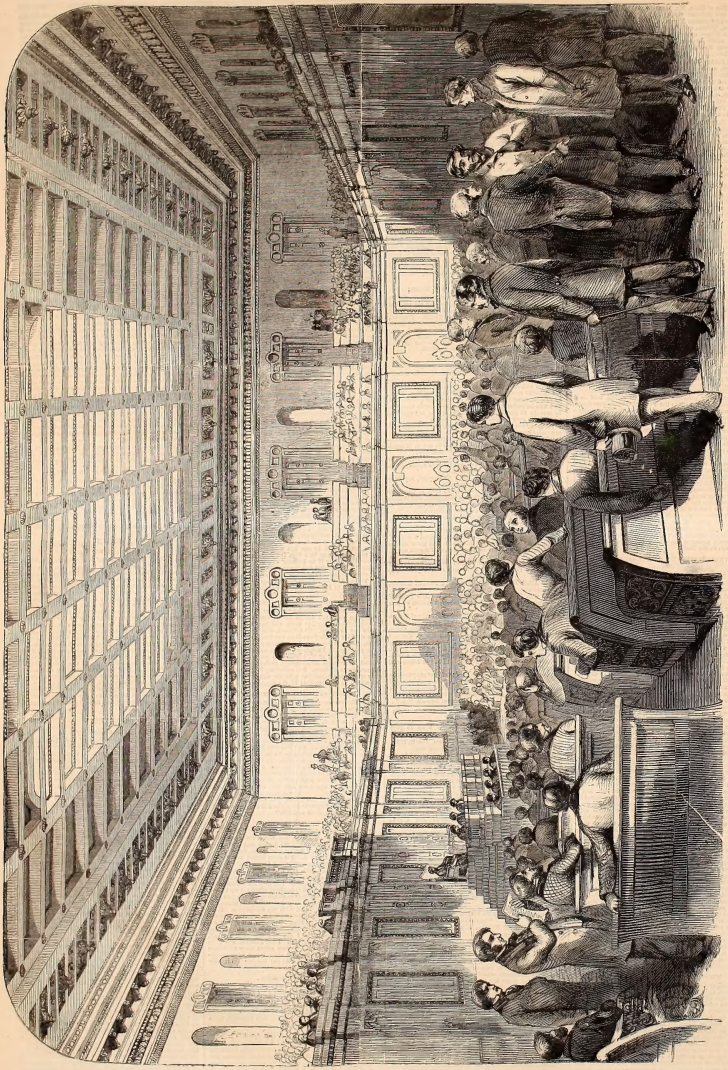
GOVERNOR WISE ON THE HARPER'S FERRY AFFAIR.

The Legislature of Virginia organized at Richmond, Virginia, on December 5.

Governor Wise's Message reviews the Harper's Ferry affair at great length. It speaks of his spirit of humiliation and sin and of the dissolution of the Union as due to sudden wisdom nuances of our entire section of the country, although unprepared for immediate separation. His program, Courts of Justice, and Legislatures which has trained up three generations of men to the manly habits of hatred to the masters of African slaves to the United States, and to the people of the non-slaveholding States, which would have such a fearful and fatal effect upon the slaves themselves, when it has sent to Union" graves. Under the numerical power which must annihilate the confederate faith, and cease to disturb our peace, to destroy our liberty and property, and to deprive us of all the protection and redress under the perverted forms and distorted working of the Union, we must take up arms. The issue is too essential to be compromised any longer. We can not stand under the rule and outrages as those of the Harper's Ferry, without suffering worse than death to citizens. The Governor proceeds to discuss the death of a State. It is not to be denied that we have many and fatal defects in our system of slaveholding States; but the conservative elements are passive, while the fanatical are active, and the former, in fact diminishing, while the latter is increasing in numbers and intensity.

THE NATURE OF THE ISSUES.

With regard to the insurgents, he says, it is a mockery to call them invasionists. If they were, then a large portion of the people of Virginia are in sympathy and nuances. The issue is self-opened this plan, and it was not put in upon the States. The issue is not upon the evil spirits of insurrection which demanded a redemption of the Constitution, but upon the evil spirits of fanaticism which desired to destroy the Union. Those evil spirits of fanaticism which desired to destroy the Union. Those evil spirits of fanaticism which desired to destroy the Union. Those



BALLOTING FOR A SPEAKER IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES AT WASHINGTON, DECEMBER, 1859.

THE CARIBBEAN SEA—A GALE OFF THE COAST OF HAYTI.

THE CARIBBEAN SEA—OFF THE MOSQUITO COAST.

THE HALL OF REPRESENTATIVES IN CONGRESS.

It is pretty generally known that an experiment is being tried in Congress. The old chairs and desks which were provided when the new House of Representatives was opened have been discarded, and sofas without desks substituted in their place. The idea has been that as members can not write, or even read comfortably, on the new sofas without desk or table before them, more attention will be paid to the speaking in the House, and short speeches and fewer orations will become the rule. We hope the experiment will succeed. In fact, every man who is elected to Congress feels bound to deliver one or two set orations on the library question, the tariff, etc.; not in the hope of influencing legislation, but simply for the benefit of his own personal fame and the gratification of his constituents. This system, if used hardly to observe it, is outrageously silly and delayed, and the public business of the country retarded, by the conversion of Congress into a vast debating club. A few sofas will soon tell us decide whether the new plan—which does not permit members to write letters while seems to be making—will check the old practice. In the mean time our engraving on page 808 will enable the public to form an idea of the change which has been effected.

STORMS IN THE CARIBBEAN.

THE two pictures we engrave herewith illustrate the periodical storms which, at this season, spread havoc and distress over the Caribbean Sea. The designs are by Dr. Eights, the well-known traveller. Every one who has traveled in Central America will recognize their fidelity to nature. There is no sea in the world more delightful to navigate in calm weather, smiling, placid, blue, with a rich ribbon; but when the northers set in, and bad weather commences, there is none which mariners more justly dread. The illustrations will commend themselves to all lovers of art.

A PHYSICIAN'S DREAMS.

I.

DREAMS being the stronghold of the mysterious, it may be supposed that I have greater soothers to relate than any ordinary commonplace man can have dwelt. But it is not so; and a slight consideration of what sleep is will show you how true that it can not be so. Dream-books rest on a very flimsy foundation; our life is a unity; sleep is not an interruption of natural laws, but a carrying out of the unvarying laws of our being; not a phenomenon, but a fact in our human constitution.

What is sleep?

Physically, sleep is a passive state of the brain, in which the blood vessels receive more, and in a most part in a manner undisturbed by the agitation of thought. A medical man has observed that for a long time, of observing the brain of a patient, which, to considerable extent, had been laid bare by a fracture, and wasted of part of the skull. He looked often at the bare brain, while the patient was awake: while the patient was asleep. The observer saw that, in a waking state, the brain had intelligent, and, as one might say, telegraphic motions, corresponding with the thoughts which it was praising off. To the doctor, looking at the exposed brain while the patient was awake, there appeared that different cerebral motions accompanied the different ideas it was excited by. He was looking manifestly at the great laboratory of thought. But in a state of sleep the patient's brain would and telegraphic no more. It became a mere pulse, like that at the wrist, and, indeed, was found to correspond, in its regular beat, with the beat at the wrist. Sleep, then, is shown not as far as the quietude of the brain is hindered, sleep is hindered in the same proportion as the more mechanical quieting of the brain induces sleep. I have read of sleepless men, who, to drown the busy brain in a kind of artificial lethargy, have had themselves whirled about on a millstone, with their heads inclining outwards, so that the blood being thrown from all parts upward to the great work-shop of the mind, flooded it, and washed out the wakefulness. I have heard others speak, also, to a hundred (doubtful), hop-pillows, fancying you are your own breath (very doubtful), draughts of heavy drink at bed-time, gin, punch, and other night-caps, have all the same intention as the millstone; namely, to make the brain a mere mechanical lying in a state of passive repose.

Yet too heavy sleep is nearly as unhealthy as, and is, perhaps, more unhealthy than a considerable degree of habitual sleeplessness. It may be questioned if there have been any finer brains than selves, after eight hours' sleep, just where they first lay down in bed, without even turning round, and certainly without dreaming, are not vigorous, perked and apposite. Yet, on the other hand, horrible, perplexing, fatiguing dreams will, themselves, a disease.

I say, in my far-gone days, two wonderful bachelor brothers (twins, I think they were), who, like Hamlet, had "bad dreams." Yet only to both of them, and never at once to either of them; honest, wiry, single-hearted, old hunting squires, of some four thousand a year. They did not drink mightily—at least I think they did not—but they chased lustily, I know. Yet I heard, with my own (then) boyish ears, the brothers, one by one, thinnest one say that he and his brother were so harassed by horrible dreams that they both slept in contiguous apartments, with nothing but slept upon door between them, on the firm mutual compact that the moment one should hear the other groan in his sleep, that one should jump out of bed and give the greater a good shaking to call him back from his world of agony.

"But do you not by this get very little sleep and refreshment?" asked my father of the narrater.

"Pardon," replied the wiry brother; "but the dreams are the great deal more than lying awake and thinking."

I am sure, and dreams (not quite so bad as the above) make a vast part of the life of mankind.

What, then, are dreams?

I would answer to this: Dreams are a combination of impressions with imperfect thought.

"Does the mind always think?" asks Locke; and, making as it seems, a conclusion from the frequent non-remembrance of dreams, that the question should be resolved in the negative. But I have frequently met this with a conclusion different right, and yet, in the course of the ensuing day, some little circumstance has suddenly cry, "Open, Sesame!" to the brain: the key turns in the door of the closet to which the mind has consigned her dreams, and they, like Aladdin's jewels, labeled, a long and perhaps strange dream, which, but for that key, would have remained unknown, we should never have remembered. The mind, then, may always think, though its thinking may not always leave a definite impression on the brain.

But there are persons who scarcely can be said to have minds, and who never think to any purpose. The error of philosophers is to judge all phenomena by their own philosophic consciousness. "Cogito, ergo sum," was the maxim of a philosopher. "Non cogito, ergo non sum," might be the maxim of another, equally true. Could we take a peep at some slumbering mass of mortality, whose brains are in his stomach, whose senses imbibed as in a state of coma, we should decidedly say, "The mind does not always think." Even such a one we have known to be subject to expect dreams or dream-phenomena. Dreams! he or no dreams by night, simply because he never thinks by day. But I have many acres of those who know they are alive, that there is a vital consciousness in existence, and a vital consciousness which is very different from the senselessness of sleep.

Dreaming is natural. Animals dream. The old dear greyhound, Tramp, in my paternal home, used to move his legs as on the top of a hill, as he were coursing. My little Skye terrier faintly barks in his sleep, chasing, doubtless, an imaginary cat—the only game he ever pursued with any fellow.

Dryden says, I suppose on the authority of experience,

"The little birds in dream their songs repeat."

The phenomena in the brain of animals and especially on sleep that he invented a theory about sleep, which he explained by the nature of their difficulties. This writer (whose name I forget, but whose work I read long since) affirmed boldly that all our dreams were caused by external agency, since to external agency they were often apparently due. He instanced his own cockatoo's peculiar spirits. They were the external agency.

"I Would the soul," he asked, "torment herself in sleep by beautiful creations? Is it not the work of the wires of such a multitude of personages as mingled last evening in the gay saloon?" Again: Man, when awake, often torments himself with disagreeable thoughts. Indigestion, to say nothing of cancerous, will often produce miserable horrors to any amount: a too full blood throbbing through the brain, or a deficiency of nutrition, seemingly palpable as these that distressed Nicholas, the British bookseller. Then, since animals dream, one might ask, "What can the mind be supposed in suggesting dreams to dogs?" and so knock down the argument by an appeal to absurdity.

Not incompatible with repose are pleasing dreams, when the lively senses have retained for some small outlay of invention, some small exercise of the imaginative faculty. Thus a vast proportion of the visions of dreams are but fabrications by a simple reference to the natural uses of sleep. "Laziness" is a word in very daily use between us. The soul is too wise to exert herself in sleep; for exertion would contradict the very reason why she is there. Accordingly, dreams, when they are pleasing, are mostly imperfect, unconnected, and void of vehemence. They are lazily-suggested. Nevertheless, I doubt not, have observed that if they dream they are going to a play, or to hear a favorite singer, they do not get to the play or opera, or to hear the singer. If they do enter what they suppose to be the theatre, it is with a very slight notion of participating in more of the character of a room than of a theatre. Or if they see the prima donna before them, she sometimes presently becomes her sister, or they hear her sing, or never heard a man sing in a manner—but very slightly—I think that there is some unimaginal reason. I imagine that a dream of sound is caused by an actual sound, which, at a considerable distance, has reached the ear, or, haps, after hearing music in a dream, heard, on waking, the musical instrument which produced the dream: perhaps nothing more musical than a London cry. Occasionally, the sound in the dream has been something the sound of the reality. I remember dreaming that I was sitting by a lady, and conversing with her (I think the conversations are not audibly carried on in dreams), when suddenly she began, to my infinite consternation, to crow like a cock. I was horrified at the, and became aware that a small bantam, in a yard over which I had lately slept, was really crowing in a shrill and female tone.

Another sort of abortive dream that I may mention is a thrusting sensation. I have frequently seemed to be fighting with an imaginary adversary, always having the advantage, and always pummeling him well. But never did it happen that I seemed to hurt my antagonist. After having rained blows upon him enough to kill him ten times over, he has invariably smiled at me, as if he said, "Thank you!" In the same way I have sometimes dreamed as I was arguing in anger with some obstinate person, whom I never succeeded in throwing into a rage.

The explanation of there abortive cases of dreaming is (as I take it), that our own sensations are clear to us in sleep, but very little beyond them. Some stray memory, some throb in the blood, makes us write a stinger to punish a foe; but the mind is too idle elaborately to create the theatre, or to put force into the adversary. In a state of imperfect sleep—that state in which a man says to himself, "I know that this is all a dream"—I have sometimes known that I could see nothing of persons or objects, which yet I fancied were around me. Then, by an effort of momentary vigor, I have opened my eyes, as it were, my mental eyes, and had a strange burst of light, and a brief revelation of persons and scenes beautiful. I remember once dreaming I was climbing up the Acropolis of Athens—which I had never seen—in this sort of imperfect sleep. Suddenly I reached the top, which I had approached from landward, and suddenly I opened my dream-illumination, so strong when it does come, revealed to me the Archipelago, and all its islands, with a distinctness which is even now vivid in my memory.

On the whole, it may be averred that imperfect sensation is the great cause of dreams. Motion of the brain, movement of the blood, crawling, or disarrangements of the stomach, various states of the skin of the mouth, all acting with them, and reproduce in sleep, the sensations and ideas with which, in a waking state, they are associated.

From imperfect motion of the brain, or too rapid passage of the blood (all the vital movements are quickened in sleep), we get many of those strange phenomena of dreams which are well known to most people, but especially to the young, whose blood is

"——gives lively and restless
Brisk as the bounding colts of princes scenes."

There are few human beings who have not dreamed of flying through the air; of falling from precipices, and of being saved, as by a miracle, as boys, experienced the sensation, at the first approach of sleep, of suddenly being pulled up in a lofty tree by the waistband. This startling feeling which has immediately awakened them, the explanation of which is the sudden relaxation of the fibres of the brain, by the very quick slumber of boyhood. Many of these hot-blooded phenomena become rare and frequent with advancing years, and die out altogether with old age: proof positive that the physical causes are nearly paramount in producing dreams.

The beginning of life, too, is the era of those disturbers which, in after time emphatically catalogued on a tomb-stone that recorded the deaths of three babies:

Hooping-cough!
Measles!
Small-pox!
Oh! dire diseases!

I know from experiences that, when such maladies are hatching in the body, the dreams for a long time beforehand are terrible. There is a confusion of horror in the somnolent visions of childhood that is never realized at any later period. Indigestion, as a boy, I have felt myself toiling on through some palpable substance, which the whole of which infinite spiders' webs and infinite threads from infinite looms were endlessly weaving about me—no, not me, but some other distinct being with which I was half converted. Then the peculiar horror appeared to be in the very fine, spun-glass sort of texture of the webs and threads which I had to draw through my enormously swollen and puffy fingers. Again, I have questioned, on this subject have told me that, in youth, the dance of infinite distaffs spinning infinite threads about their distaves, or highly enlarged heads, was an amusing torment to them.

Crawling insects, poisonous snakes, scratching cats, are dream-forms of perjudged blood. Even dream books prove this, for there is scarcely a form of life, instinct of loathing and fear in full which dream books ascribe to himself, that is not interpreted for the benefit of the million, than about that multitudes agree in their dreams. Pity that the ingenuity of the dream-interpreter should be wasted in a philosophy, but a dream proves, and where it arises! Misfortunes can not be averted nor does dream-interpretation ever pretend to do it; nothing ominous dreams; but diseases possibly may. When dreams are very ugly, very horrific, like inherent, instinctive loathing and fear a full in the stocks, or the treachery of a friend, should be sure of a bad digestion, and reform his diet accordingly. Finally, it is said, supped on raw pork would not roast pork have sufficed?) before he attacked the fat pig.

Indigestion, both in its labor and its fatigue, is the prolific begetter of ugly dreams. So is any uncomfortable sensation, however slight it may be; for in the passive state of sleep effects are produced disproportionate to their causes. I have sometimes dreamed of being stung by a serpent, and having to hold tight by the teeth of a dog. On waking, I have invariably found some slight uneasiness or pain in the part which I had made so sure was severely bitten. Of course I was lying with my arm or hand pressed under me.

Another consideration that shows dreams to be colored, according to the state of the stomach and head, is that frequently a horrid dream turns off into agreeable one, a sore pleasant one. I remember once going to bed after a later supper and more wine than I usually take. My first dreams were of a frightful character myself to be in some unknown country, arriving at a mysterious hotel. I was put to dine in a mysterious room, which resembled the hall of an old castle. A statue clad in black armor stood at each of the four angles of the apartment. I was lying in a dim, shadowy bed, with a strong sense of the supernatural upon me, when suddenly I thought I saw the four figures in armor move on their pedestals. The sense of the supernatural now become in me horrifying and intense. A long time seemed to pass, during which I strained my eyes to see if the statues really did move. I saw, by a sort of nightmare feeling, held motionless in the bed. Again the figures seemed to stir. This state of thing continued during what appeared to me to be hours. I watched the statues in a fascinated manner. Suddenly the statues lifted their arms, then stepped down from their pedestals, and advanced toward me. I struggled to get up, but could only utter faint cries. I never all this time imagined the figures to be earthly. But now a sudden change came over me. I felt loosed from my nightmare bonds, and by a prodigious effort leaped out of bed. At the same moment a conviction seized me that the figures were supernatural. Then I awoke, and certainly fresh and blood. I rested on the thought that the whole thing was a trick to frighten me. Then I vigorously set to work to think on the intruders all round (they, as usual in dreams, making the room crowded, and kicked them out at the door in a most satisfactory manner. After this I awoke, and lay really awake for a short time, with an exaggerated impression left upon me. Again I fell asleep. I was still at the hotel, which was no longer mysterious, but simply dirty and full of bodies, with whom I had formerly traveled. I was thinking of my supposed adventure in the statue-room, and was coming to the conclusion (with complacency) that I had dreamed it. Still I wished to put the matter beyond doubt. On leaving the room then entering, I asked him some question about the room. He, in real landlord fashion, began to press his reference to my bedroom, explaining that it had it looked old and shabby, and saying he meant to do something to the statues. I felt myself quite master of my suspicions, and concluded I had dreamed the statues. Still, I wanted to be extra sure, and represented that I should like to have the room to look at the apartment where I had slept. The landlord did go up with me to the room; and, when I saw it, the last lingering ideas of even the supernatural or the tricky disappeared from my mind. There were no pedestals in the room, certainly no statues, and the whole apartment, with its furniture, was totally unlike anything I had seen—for it had shrunk from the proportions of a nightmare into those of a mere sleeping-room—looked on entering it. I was master of my bed-chamber, and left the inward laugh of leather-stockings to think I had ever been mastered by mountebanks. In this amused state of sensation I again woke. A third time I slept. The old dream was still dimly carried on, but, by the sole threat of an idea of traveling, for was on a pleasant tour; I was with the charming friends whom I had seen in the day. Yet behind, only remembered to be laughed at. Certainly, many hands greeted me agreeably, and at half past seven, my usual hour, I awoke with a feeling of indignant amusement and comfort.

THE CLOSEST SHAVE OF MY LIFE.

THE State Prison at C——is, every way considered, under a better organized and surer system of administration than any similar institution I have known. I have seen many, and looked somewhat closely into their methods of management and discipline, and have often seen much to approve; but the prison at C—— surpasses all the rest. Visitors of which, very frequently, for they are admitted, are amazed at the regularity, the order, and, most singular of all, the air of security which pervades the whole establishment.

As we wandered through the chambers in the great part of which there was glimmer of light, the window of which a man was looking so anxiously that he did not hear us enter. When he turned around his eye was gleaming wildly. The new warden said he did nothing but stand at that window all night, and when he was unoccupied. He was a sailor, we learned, whose offense was that he had beaten almost to death a comrade for speaking slightingly of a toast his wife. He was, for three years, six months of which had passed, and he was one of the most exemplary in the prison. They had found out that he was accomplished—that there was no better barber any where; so he was allowed to shave the fellows to the extent of a splendid position and the responsibility of razors.

"He has shaved me many a time better than I could do it myself, and I have left him there always, gentlemen?" said the warden.

I thought there was something quite taking in the idea, and acknowledged myself to be touched favorably with the proposition.

"Johnson, you will shave this gentleman," said the warden.

I drew off my cloak and settled myself comfortably in the big chair. Johnson made grave preparations.

I always hated a razor. It is a villainous necessity. I wonder if any body thinks it delightful, that blunted edge of the sharp one to be shaved, and that slow scrape over the throat, with the skin drawn drum-tight.

When my turn came, Johnson was the stop the warden said,

"We will leave you for five minutes, Mr. H——. Is that time enough, Johnson?"

Quite time enough, Sir," answered Johnson.

The gentlemen left the room. All my companions went away in another direction from that in which I had been passing, and the warden swung the door wide open as he passed through, leaving it unclosed. From my position I saw them walk along the top of the wall, within the prison, to a corner, where they spoke a little with the officer in charge. Then they moved on, officer and all, out of sight.

Upon each corner of the prison wall a guard is always stationed, well armed, to watch that no attempts at escapes are made. The moment this one disappeared I felt a sort of faint shiver of the razor against my lip. Immediately after my barber ceased operations, walked leisurely to the door and looked out, and returning, passed an instant at the window where we had found him when we entered. Then he came to me and resumed his work. I felt vaguely alarmed.

Presently the prisoner spoke. His voice was very low, quite a whisper, indeed, and he cut his words short. But how distinct they were!

"Do you hear me, Sir?" he asked.

"Yes," said I.

"It's a ticklish thing, this shaving, isn't it?" said he. "But my hand is always steady. I can do what I please with a razor—just what I please. Its good enough to keep still, very still, just now. I'm close on to a large vein, you see, right in your neck. Keep very still, and don't stir. I know what would happen, and so do you, if you stirred or spoke a word.

Good God! These were hideous words: but the glare of the man's eye, as he came round in front of me, was appalling. I could not have uttered a syllable if I had died otherwise.

"Now," said he, "listen, but don't move," and he pressed the long blade against my throat, as if by way of warning. "I don't like this. I can't stand it. I'm going! And look you, Sir, if you lift a finger to stop me, or make one noise, both of us will have to die! I would a little rather not hurt you; but—Silence!"

He sprang away, and caught up my cloak and hat, which lay near, still keeping that razor in his hand. The moment its frightful contact was removed my nerves re-assisted. I leaped up, seized the chair on which I had been sitting, and turned hastily. He turned upon me like a tiger.

"Ah, you will have it, then!" he cried, and rushed toward me.

I thrust him aside with the heavy chair, and lifting it high in the air, brought it down crashing upon him. He sank for a second, but quickly rose again. He was heavier than I, and twice as strong, I suppose. Persons who have been thrown in positions of great danger will not be astonished to hear that I thought, for my first act, to call on God at all. I thought only of defending myself.

This state of things did not last a quarter of a minute. He would have beaten me down soon enough, had I not, in sheer desperation, made use of a trick which I had once before seen gymnasts have employed. I moved my eyes suddenly from him, and stared wildly into the space behind him, pointing; at the same time nod in the same direction with my arm. By a lucky chance I pointed to the window.

I think that movement saved my life.

He stopped, irresolute, glanced at the window, flung his head down on his long, gaunt arm as if he were checking, and, dashing the razor against the stone wall, fell trembling and sobbing at my feet. I stepped swiftly across the floor he called out to me.

"Don't go, don't go!" he said. "Stand there, at the door, if you choose, but wait a minute. It's all over now, and I'm myself. In one hour me, you won't wonder that I was driven mad."

I hardly knew how to act; but as I involuntarily chuckled at my own safety he continued:

"Look out at that window, Sir, and you'll see, just over the road, a man with a child in his arms, standing in a doorway. That's my wife and baby—my poor wife and baby. She doesn't know it is here—locked for dead. She is now under a wrong name, and she supposes I'm far away at sea. I gave it out myself, and only I and the doctor know the truth. Well, Sir, that's my home. I've seen it, and I've seen her, every day, now, these three months. It used to make me crazy, but I bear it better now. But this chance—this great chance—came to me, and to relieve them. I came near losing all hope of ever seeing her again."

Could I doubt those straggling sobs and tears? There was truth in every tone. I looked through the window, and saw, as he had said, a woman standing in a threefold opposite, with a little child. She tossed it up laughingly once or twice, and disappeared.

"You won't trust me, I know," said the prisoner; "but I want to beg you not to let the warders know of this. It's no use, I guess. Well, I swear that I'll be true to home after this. Nothing but three years solitary now, and when that's over, what's that? No, no, you'll let this go by, won't you? You may believe me—you may trust me."

Foot-shuffling along the passages announced the return of my companions. The prisoner endeavored to calm himself, and I put on an air of composure which I think was very successful under the circumstances.

"And shall you?" said the warden, astonished. If he had but known how close a shave I had been enough!

"I have broken my razor," said Johnson, looking appealingly at me. "See, Sir! I must have another."

"Very well," said the warden. "Will you wait?" he asked me.

"I think not," said I. "Another time will do for me."

So I wiped my face, and we went on our way.

Of course I was bound to tell the warden what had happened; but even in that painful moment which naturally followed so narrow an escape I think I set forward all that I could in the prisoner's favor. The warden received the story with perfect composure, and assured me that he would act to it, in a manner as though nothing had occurred. He condemned his own heedlessness in opening no evident an opportunity for guilt with much more severity than he put on his own offense itself.

I could not resist visiting the wife of Johnson. I discovered that his story was true, and learned his real name. She was happy in her ignorance of his real condition. I sought to ascertain whether she was able to sustain herself until he should rejoin her; and then she told me that Mr. ——, the warden of the State Prison, had also come to her, shown interest in her behalf, for which she could not well account, and assured her of his aid and protection in any need that might come to her. She was most grateful, but wondered why he had done so.

A few months ago the following newspaper paragraph appeared. It was much copied, and, I suppose, will be readily remembered:

"It is the custom at the prison in Lo—— to permit prisoners whose terms are within a few weeks of expiration, to work outside the walls, under the supervision of an officer. This privilege is, in most cases, gladly accepted, a few weeks ago, however, it was declined by a man who, at his time of freedom drew near, appeared more restless under his confinement than any others. On inquiry it was found that this prisoner's wife and child living directly within view of the walls, and that for nearly three years he had seen her daily, she being all the while ignorant of his imprisonment, and supposing that her husband was absent from home on a long voyage. He was unwilling that, at the last moment, the knowledge should reach her, and, at his own request, he continued within the walls until his liberation, which took place on the 10th instant. Under caution, his comfort while in prison had been without blemish."

THE BLIND MAN'S WIFE.

PART I.—THE JOURNEY.

I WENT from Paris to Calais by the so-side. My journey was not without incidents. The carriage in which I set out was at that time vacant of all passengers but myself and a couple of lady companions. Where it first stopped a change occurred. A man who had been standing on the platform, possibly numbering years between twenty-five and fifty, got into the carriage with the air of one who had not seen, or, if he had seen, was careless of my legs, and when I moved took no notice of the fact; he arranged himself and several small parcels with the effect an appearance of having about that I had suddenly a disagreeable sense of being crowded, and with a feeling of annoyance I made up my mind that I should disturb my companion. He spoke to the guard, and insisted that I should be put into the next post. It was comforting to learn from this that I should not have my unconscious companion all the way to Boulogne. I found that the cause of my peculiar sensations excited by this person when another station was reached.

As we slackened our pace I saw a lady on the platform, whose sudden animation as our carriage neared her was readily recognizable as that of a friend. But his countenance exhibited no emotion; not with his lady spoke, and when I "Ah, Lucie!" did he appear to be aware of his being known.

"Teresa!" he answered, with a slightly foreign accent, and opening the door, was in an instant at her side. She was accompanied by a little boy, who, when I took for her servant. This person proceeded to place a shawl on the seat opposite to her companion, and immediately left the platform.

The step was of an impossible height.

"Will you take my hand?" I said. She thanked me, and in reply bowed.

Her "thank you" was gentle; her smile—though it was more grave than I had yet seen it—seemed to me—was extraordinarily sweet; and her "Now, Lucie!" made me feel that the so-called was an assistant whom I could not have refused. Her husband would not to very easy to give. In an instant we were seated in another instant I had begun to feel myself again invisible; and with such force did the sensation cling to me that I felt no discomfort nervously in the consciousness of happy, and I became nervous. I wondered if I should get the opportunity of saying that I was losing my personal identity? Another and another station. We stopped ten minutes for refreshment. The attendant came to the door—a cup of coffee in her hand.

"Have some coffee, Lucie?

"Yes, Teresa."

"Nugent! another cup."

The man brought another. I jumped out of the carriage, drank a glass of sherry in some solitude, and got back to the platform before the bell rang to start. The gentleman had left empty coffee-cup toward us as if I had been one of the waiters. Again the same arrangements for the journey were to be taken. Teresa blushed, not rosy but deepred with confusion, a strong sense of annoyance no longer took hold of me. It all passed in a moment. But astonishment at his insolence—at his calm indifference to my being—at his power to smile on her agitated form; and my perception and inexpressible admiration of her great beauty, as she raised toward me the face that a very thick veil had shaded till now, all in that moment mingled with my annoyance, and I almost absolutely vanished—fled forever—leaving only admiration behind, as she said, "Forgive us, Sir; my husband is blind!"

"What have I done?" asked Leslie, emotionless no longer.

She told me their name. I had my carpet-bag, with my full directions, easily read letter on the white canvas cover, on the seat before me. She read it as she cursed speaking.

Reginald Deane, Esq. My father had a friend of that name, a man of large property; he was fond of literature and art, and had lived a great deal part of his life in Germany. There my father lived. I was born in Germany; Leslie, too, was born there. Coincidence, this.

There was such music in her voice, such sweetness in her accented tone, I was sorry that the demand of this beautiful young woman could not be what I now. I wondered if he could guess at her great loveliness. I felt sure that she must be a mingled gentleness and majesty that seemed to me to distinguish her from all other ladies of the age. I could see that I had ever had the luck to look upon. She cursed speaking, and I said,

That Reginald Deane was my uncle. His property was divided by seven when he died, and one such portion came to me."

The blind man spoke: "My wife's father's name was Leslie; I was called after him; we are cousins. We had been engaged to be married almost from childhood. Was she not good to keep her word? If you years before our marriage I went to the West Indies, and by my own fault had a sunstroke there. I always think that my blindness grew out of that. I was very ill for a year and a half, suffering from painful variations of sight. Then I woke one morning, and knew I was awake, yet all was dark! She married me, nevertheless."

Servant was the wife—Newport, Newport. Change for Bembly!" Here we were, then. The blind Mr. Barrington collected all his parcels, passed out, helped his wife, and said, "Where is Mr. Deane?"

"Now what can I do?"

"Well, you ask if Sir Frederick Worth's carriage is here," went for the luggage, too. This is very kind of you."

Sir Frederick's carriage, and Sir Frederick's drag for the ladies—servants who knew their work, and magnificent horses who knew their masters—a structure I was. I did Nugent's business like a man, not my butler, I am afraid; for Mrs. Barrington, on her husband's arm, gave many sweet-voiced directions: "Oh, but under that cranie, please." "Will you tell the man to put those little boxes on the top?" And, "Nugent, pass put all those light things in the carriage, and not to the rig," and so on.

"Then card has our direction when in London to it," said Mr. Barrington; "I hope we shall see you again." And all kind people, he talked of seeing.

The carriage drove up. Mrs. Barrington got in.

"Now, Leslie!"—once more those sweetly-toned words!

"But where are you going now?" addressing me.

"I am going to Bembly."

"Do you live there?"

"No. I go—I go—for a little change," I answered, unable to tell the truth. She smiled, too. What a radiance was that smile!

"We shall be there ourselves in a fortnight, I hope. We have taken a house—Fernhurst—never was there: but you will find us out."

The footman got up behind. Mr. Barrington.

That evening I contemplated my outer man in the looking-glass. I was my shoulder, fair reader. As we me—man of forty, not gray yet, neither wrinkled nor fat: in excellent health. Accustomed to the world and I were on good conscience. "A Westminster toy still!" was my own thought, as my young ladies might have called me middle-aged: sensible man—woman would in no pronounce me an excellent match; so thought—such a good friend for Bess, and I experience quite a blessing.

These observations are not out of place, for I—hitherto supposed to be a confirmed bachelor—stood at that glass, and took into consideration—performing, with the shoulders spoke of me—my need? Had I asked my sister, who lived comfortably in the country about sixteen miles off, she would have answered, "Beauty," I am sure. I do know, Reginald, but it is perfectly certain that you would have asked for Bess, and insisted on it if she had been there. I heard a soft echo of another answer, "Now, now, Lucie!" I repeated the words, and applied them differently. But where was the lady, and who? I did not know a living woman to whom I could have applied the self. Once, twenty years ago, I had supposed myself heart-broken: and perhaps something did happen, as I had been in love since. Why had it never married? A wrong form of the question. I mentioned to myself, and looked at my face with a relish. "Why don't I marry? I wonder if she has a will?"

Next morning I went all over Beaumont. A decent woman showed me the house. It did'nt-size, but a liberal gentleman, she thought. It was the healthiest place, and would be the prettiest, in mid-March. I thought I'd say so was wandered away till about four o'clock. I had not been in my lodgings more than half an hour when I heard such a noise of voices—chirruping like birds, and odors of young birds at sung—and low, sweet laughs that made me smile. The door opened, and a child, all sash and flounce, and hat and feathers, stood rosy and speaking:

"I am Bessie Deane! If you please, Georgy, and nurse, and I are come to say that Mrs. Barrington and mamma are at Beaumont, and they are coming here, and are you at home, Mr. Deane?"

Upon which the little spokeswoman stepped back with a courtesy—a chirruping like birds—a very shy, and nurse courtesying, appeared in the back-ground. All the words were said, apparently, who had taken her place at the open window, cried out, "Here they are!" and once more I was in the beautiful presence of the blind man's wife.

The children were wild about the beach and the sea. Their mother standing by them, left Mrs. Barrington for a moment by my side. I opened the invitation that I had seen me, and gave it to her.

"Do you know who that is?"

"Do you?" she asked, with a smile, wondering and beautiful.

"No."

As she gazed smiling, and pushing her rich hair aside—for she had taken off her hat—the picture of Leslie's face on her, and another Mrs. Barrington grew more like the picture, or the ivory like a mirror reflected, it appeared to my puzzled senses difficult to decide. It was a marvelous picture of her, just as she stood at that moment in her glorious beauty—so like—so humanly like, it seemed to me, that, watching for my answer, I felt I began to consider whether I had any right to keep so perfect a likeness of another man's wife.

"It is my mother," she said. "She was a Miss Barrington—Leslie's aunt—an heiress. My father, Colonel Leslie, outlived her several years. They are both dead now. Mr. Deane, I know how you got this."

She looked toward Lady Worth, and spoke to her.

"Margaret, the children would see the bay best from that inner room."

Her friend understood her, and we were left alone.

"It is strange that we should have met by chance," she said, speaking rapidly. "I can tell you what you might never have known had we not met. Your uncle loved my mother, Mr. Deane. They never met after she was married. But at her funeral—he is buried at Bembly—a stranger stood by the grave weeping. That stranger was Mr. Deane. He had not expected to see my father there. He had come from Leslie's aunt, taking the up the arm, my father spoke to him. From that hour they became friends. Such friends—the man who had loved and been loved—she, to whom the man who had loved and never been loved again. This picture in a copy of one I have, which my father left taken some time during the first year of his married life. It was painted by a friend of my mother's favor. Your uncle was with my father on his death-bed. It is a strange tale, Mr. Deane! And it is time that I went. We shall be here next Thursday."

We shook hands, and children and nurse made to me by Lady Worth.

As Lady Worth turned round to see after her children, I offered my hand again to Mrs. Barrington, and said, as she took it with a frank smile,

"Mrs. Barrington, you are a dear creature!"

One keen, quick look from those eyes, usually so soft and gay, followed by a glance of intense astonishment, and—vexed—vexed me through and through like a sharp irritating pain. Instantly her face changed—she had read my countenance. She never took her eyes from mine, but looked at me sweetly, fearlessly; and, with a wondering, almost questioning gladness in her voice, said,

"No!"

When they had been gone five minutes, that past was like a dream.

PART II.—THE CHANGE.

THAT summer came, and I stood on the entrance-gate to bid my new friends welcome to Beaumont. It was the first sound of my voice Leslie Barrington uttered my name: and "Here I am!" How pleasant to be welcomed by a friend!"—Mrs. Barrington laying her hand on his left word—delivered immediately. While the trunks were being taken from the carriages, Leslie said,

"Walk on round, Teresa."

"This way, then," she said.

Then then, as I spoke to the blind, walked round the green in front, describing it to him, always using the word that sounded to me so sadly:

"See, see, Leslie, there is the right to the gate by which we entered—a handsome-looking iron gate; there is the left—a gate at the end of the gate with iron-railings on the top. It joins the house, see, on one side of the gate, and it is set at no other angle, for it is a high wall—the high wall opposite to us. How pretty it looks!—a vine, a virginia creeper, and such a climbing rose! It is a high wall, just like the opposite one, on our left, too. I wonder why it is? It is bare of trees and plants! Close to the house there is a door—a doorway, a door-way in the wall—let us go through it."

I opened the door, and she passed.

"Oh, such a sight! Leslie, this is what you are supposed to have nothing about. There is a garden standing; low stone-walls, covered with ivy, look, with their green and brown paper! The window in the roof are glass, in diamonds and triangles."

We walked through the large square at the back of the house, which had been made tolerably free of rubbish for the convenience of the tenants, and we stood on the green down, with the sky arching above us and busy insect life all around. Mr. Barrington moved in a perfect way.

"You will grow stronger here," she said, resting closer to his side, and clasping his arm.

She looked up at him, and I looked at the fair evening sky with a face of worship. She watched him: her eyes seemed to me to be full of the strong woman's love in that smiling contemplation. I was evident that they were all things to each other. Would he ever be made to know that by the sight of her marvelous beauty? I thought not. Le fait accompli. It is the vision of a lover we present to that mysterious interior sense which still be called seeing.

I walked round hospitably. They were standing on the short sweet turf when I last looked back. She was stooping toward him, and he still looking up to him. I recollect the fondness of the face that freely poured forth its love upon his darkness, and the face that received it through the sunlit.

The week passed. My sister had spent several days with me, bringing my nephews, two fruitsome, handsome school-boys. She and Mrs. Barrington had talked over many things. Our friendship had grown rapidly. We had shown her many of my uncle's property, in which she had failed to our father of her mother. We had together destroyed what other eyes were not to see. Leslie Barrington was to have presented all drawings, and we had learned to love him. There was a peculiar relation about his thoughts, and a singular tenderness in all his feelings. It was impossible not to rejoice in his wife's devotion to him, neither could we help feeling that it was natural.

It was at the close of the second week that I received a letter from my sister, in which she touched my lodgings my landlady told me that Mr. and Mrs. Barrington had called in the afternoon to ask for my address, as they would like to be near with them. She said they had looked quite disappointed on being told that I was not expected until late. Pleased with this little attention, I determined to call on them early the following morning, and so went to bed.

I was waked from a sound sleep by a horrible noise—sound of loud voices and wailings and violent blows at my door. The first words that came to me with a full consciousness of their meaning were, "Fire! fire! Oh, Sir, the blind gentleman! fire! fire!" Afterward, on looking back as calmly as I could through the events as they had followed each other, I could never tell how I got to the house—with whom, or by what way. All that I was there, in that front, between the inclosing walls, and I can see myself now standing—just cause, I suppose—standing where the Virginia creeper clung to the masonry, and hung its luxuriant green above my head.

I can see now, as I think of it, masses of flame and smoke leaping with a strange sound from the windows of the lower part of the house. I do not know how long it took me to be in the throng that half filled the hall. But I know that I was, for almost among them, crying, "Mr. Barrington is in the house! Where is the light—a hundred pounds to the man who brings out Mr. Barrington!" Alas! the clumsy attempts to assist them that had been made before I got to the spot had only increased their danger. The case was already desperate. The hall was a smoky atmosphere of flame and smoke, and again I was thrust with that close mass of persons back from the house to the green in front.

Again all seemed right; but I knew that I was at the back of the house, and in it. I never thought of terror. Her husband—perhaps dead—and I had learned how truly he was her life, how utterly he was its all-absorbing joy—her husband was in my thoughts; I felt convinced that I had saved him at save. I was up the staircase, the sea-breeze coming across the lawn and fed the flames, but we said them forward toward the front that I had left. I got into the passage, opened a red baize door, and saw Leslie standing, safe as a statue, in the corridor. At that moment the floor split just beyond where he stood with the smoke all on explosion. I tried him. He knew me. The flames burst up—he knew that too. He was praying aloud to "My God, O God!" I saw this in my, his sightless eyes fixed as upon something far away. "Thy gift—Thy best, greatest, purest gift—a dozen of innumerable bounty—much of immutable love—" He was speaking of Teresa. I lifted him from the ground, put him on my back, and turned round—turned round to see the staircase I had come up in a cloud of smoke, stripped by bright flashes of flame.

There was but one thing to be done. Death was by us, and must be fled from. Death was before us; but with speed, courage, a rapid foot, and a strong will, the resolution was to scarcely formed before it was acted on, the danger was breasted—I rushed down upon me. It was not more than a minute's work, but the flames licked our faces, and took the skin off at each stroke; we were both of us on fire, but both safe, welcomed by hundreds of extended arms.

That square at the back of the house was full of men all looking to one point, all breathless with one fear. I saw that toss great emotion swayed them. As if impelled by a common instinct they parted down the centre of the space; that dense body of living men seemed to dissolve away till, rapidly, almost a clearance was made in the immediate neighborhood of the house. I saw this, and I heard a voice, "She was at the window a moment ago." Then I perceived that every eye was turned upward among the watchers, and that some one also animated a busy knot of men, to give space to whose operations the crowd had receded to the open lawn, and fenced round the scene as with a dark wall of life.

I knew no more about Leslie Barrington; I was among those men in an instant. No one told me—words were not wanted—every thing, as if by magnetism, was instantaneously comprehended. No one told me, but I knew that the only way to get Teresa from the burning house was to raise supports high enough to enable a way to be made from the upstanding gable of the ruined house to the window where, time after time, she appeared. It was already impossible to reach her from below. Beneath her was a gulf of flame. The staircase had only just come, and only now had the engines been got into efficient work. They played away round the window where, enveloped in a blanket, she had last shown herself. Had the fire-escapes and ladders been three-quarters of an hour sooner, she might have been got out with comparative ease; now, no one could approach the lower part of the house. How did this wild scheme work—well. And the only chance left was to build a bridge across the angle to where she was, and bring her along it. Still the fire-engines played on the wall —still she appeared and disappeared. She had never spoken a word, never given a single cry for help. We all knew who—how, to spare her husband, she had borne her bitter agonies. She lost nothing by this great forbearance. The supports rose, the bridge-way was half across. It was not very far; it was to a height and a way that not six men in that multitude could venture to tread with any hope of success. Suddenly flames burst forth from the ends of the house nearest to the bridge-way. It must be done quickly now. Old easements had been used by the builders at the back of the house, and through one she was now leaning, clinging to the casement with her hands. A youth—the steadiest head and quickest hand among the workmen—had succeeded in so nearly reaching her as to thrust before him on the plank a light ladder with a rope fastened to the end. She comprehended in an instant, broke the pane out of the casement that did not open, pulled the ladder into the open window, tied it to the mullion, and, thrusting herself through the opening, she stood on the window-sill, reaching forward for help. We could watch that plank, that ladder and lean her on? Boldly, steadily, the youth moved forward. As she stepped on the ladder he faltered; another step and it swayed; he recovered his balance, lost it again, and fell—fell toward the house. A sudden rush was made toward him, and he was safe, but with a broken arm. Still she never uttered a sound; but I saw her clinging to the middle mullion, looking down among the crowd; and I knew for whom she looked. In an instant another man was on that plank; but he was too anxious—too quick: he dropped before he had gone half the way. And now there was a pause.

I was among the rafters of the ruined house, and near the place from which the bridge-way started. I could hear her cry. The misery of my weakness! Would no one else attempt it?

I looked down; I saw—believe me, reader, it is true, as truly as you see these words—I saw among the blocks of wood and litter of bricks and beams, sheltered by the same roof that sheltered me, and surrounded by a strange white shimmering light, a woman, clad in a purple-colored robe—it might have been her burial-dress, so it looked to me—like a statue, pale and unreal-like, yet with dark waving locks, in large masses, on her shoulders. But the sea-breeze never moved a hair of its long length; and, but that it was darker than Mrs. Barrington's, being nearly black, and the whole figure taller, I might have mistaken them. Now I had never believed in ghosts, I had never thought much about them; but no doubt of that form being her mother's ever crossed my mind. It was her—taller, sadder, in a strange pale light of unearthly whitesomeness, standing as a sculptor might make an angel stand, with her eyes fixed on the figure who was holding by the mullion, and gazing among the crowd below. I say I never doubted that the grave had given up its dead, and that He to whom all things were possible had for some great purpose sent her there. So I spoke under this strong sense of the supernatural which kept all fear away. I said, "For the love of God, what is her danger?" And I had the answer, how I can not tell you, for I do not remember any voice; but in another moment I was standing below. I looked toward the place where the apparition had been, and it was not there. I went quickly, for I had to do its bidding.

The clergyman of Bearhly, and other good men, had taken charge of Mr. Barrington. They were telling him what was doing, not truly, but with such eminence as made it easy for him to hope and even feel secure of his wife's safety. I stood before them.

FEARFUL SITUATION OF TERESE.

"Mr. Barrington," I said, "you are wanted. The bridge-way to your wife is so high, and ways so much, that two men have fallen in trying to reach her. She is standing on the sill of the bedroom window opposite the drawing-room. It is the only way of getting her out."

Then was no need for more. He had got up and had said "Lead me on."

Horror was painted on every face. They brought hope on mine. We advanced to where she could see me. She stretched forth her arms. I said, "She must approach you." He replied, "Thank God."

He was soon up to the gable, and stood still.

"You must remember," I said, "that the way is safe, though it does sway. It is of planks on to within ten feet of her—though a ladder reaches from the plank to her. That is a difficult place. And take care when you reach her—be nervous, be double weight."

"Keep close together!" called a man from the crowd.

Leslie Barrington waved his hand toward the valley, and stepped with a cautious foot upon the plank. He took three or four steps very slowly, then walked on bravely, getting slower again as he reached the place of peril—the ladder. What a silence reigned below! Only the rushing of the water, the sound of the fire-engines and the voices of the flames. Then came her voice so calm, and sweet, and tenderly low.

"My husband—my darling—I am coming to you!"

She stepped on the trembling ladder, held up her hands once as she nearly lost her balance, and where the ladder and the plank met—just where poles from below made steady the ends of each—they stood together; she had gone across these bare like a bird. She stood not trusting herself to look on any thing but his eighteen eyes. The silence below was unbroken; women dropped upon their knees; many prayed in their hearts, as I did. To our unutterable surprise, in stooping he lifted her in his arms, and leaned her on his shoulder across his breast. He turned round and walked back to where, on a temporary sort of flooring, I stood, and gently touching his arm as I had learned to do, guided him to the plank, where he set her down in safety.

The gazing world below made amends for silence then. How they cheered! They woke the seagulls from their nest, and the rocks and caverns filled echoed the cheer. Amidst it all I saw them into a carriage, and found that the clergyman had arranged for them to go into a house close to his own, where they could be quiet in lodgings for a time.

"Any body else can come into our house," he said; "the carriage and horses, and men-servants are gone to the doctor's. He waits for him at 5, Bank Terrace."

So I ran by the carriage and helped them out; saw Nugent at the door of the new residence—shook hands with Dr. Bennet; told Terese I should come in the morning, and went home to thank God, and get some refreshment as I might.

The next day, and many days following, I went to see them, in a week's time they had recovered from the effects of their danger and fright. They gave God thanks publicly, and distributed a large sum of money among those who helped them.

Terese could talk of it now. And I had often thought that I would tell her of the apparition. But so solemn was the remembrance that I could not, for some weeks, get strength enough to speak of it.

At last, just before the day fixed for my departure, when I was sitting with her alone in the drawing-room of their lodgings, I began to tell her. At first she heard me with a strange half-frightened face; but, as I went on, she looked intently interested, now and then asking me a question in her sweet voice, and regarding me with a gentleness which had something sisterly in it.

I ceased speaking, and she answered me—answered with a question put with a downcast face, and the last possible smile trembling on her lips.

"Why have you never married?"

I was vexed.

I said, suddenly. "Perhaps because I have never seen a woman I could love."

"Yes, you have!" she answered, quickly.

And if the spirit of mischief ever dwelt in woman, and looked out of woman's eyes, it looked out of those that now met mine unsurprisedly caught my somewhat agitated face. "Yes, you have!" She rose, opened a door that led into another room, and said, "Enter!"

There came forth a lady, younger, taller, darker-haired, and as beautiful as Terese.

"Ethel Barrington. Mr. Deane, my husband's sister. She is younger than I am—don't stare at me, Ethel—but very like—very like my beautiful mother, and your picture of her; is she not? Of course we thought you knew every thing. But Ethel had come to us, the night of the fire, from Sir Frederick Wortle's. She and the servants had had all time to be helped each somehow. I could not leave Leslie. He went to a room to secure papers that were found him, and you know the rest. Ethel was fetched again the next morning by Lady Wortle. It was then we told you that Leslie could tread that terrible plank. She was returned to us yesterday. Do you understand it now?"

I did understand it. I understood, too, the bright exulting glance that would follow me and feel me out, and tell me again and again, without the trouble of words, till I was shamefaced and cowardly, and struck with tremor and chicken-heartedness, that I had—yes, I had, and that I loose I had seen the woman I could marry, and that Ethel Barrington was she. Do you doubt it; question it? I am Ethel Barrington's: she is mine.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1859, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

TRUMPS

BY GEORGE WILLIAM CURTIS.

CHAPTER LXXXV.

HOPE WAYNE.

HOPE WAYNE looked quickly forward to meeting Lawrence Newt at dinner. That day, the morning after Mrs. Simcoe's story the two women met pleasantly at breakfast. The glance of the other sister was scarcely noted, but too curious; and what did she see? Only a little manner of little girls. The sister which made Arthur Merlin think of her as a goddess. There were no traces of tears, no sudden gray hairs; there was nothing but a calm, smiling, thoughtful face, which told no tales.

The sisters walked lightly together; were often silent, and parted for the morning's duties. Hope Wayne knew that she should not hear the quick step upon the stair, nor the kind voice in counsel, which had made her daily duty a deep, unspeakable delight. That reliance which is natural—love leaning upon love—it was gone, then? There was one dream less.

For a day or two there was no sound of singing as she moved through the house; nor did she hear herself in the library at her desk, but rather kept near Mrs. Simcoe, with her work in hand, incessantly conversing. The severity of the elder woman had long been softened in the calm, cheerful, daily pressure of Hope, and they had many a long and pleasant hour which they conversed and for which they worked with the utmost industry and heartiness.

During these days Mrs. Simcoe sighed sometimes as she thought of her companion. For she knew that at the moment of need and during the delay of burial the survivor is pretematurally calm; the husband quietly settles the details of the funeral, the mother tenderly lays her darling in its last, last bed. But there comes presently the moment of revulsion, when the still waters so long tranquilly accumulating break away and sweep, a terrible and resistless torrent, over the soul. So she dreaded the very quiet; in which, however, she could not detect any pressure, and which did not seem forced.

"Hope, dear," Mrs. Simcoe said, involuntarily, at times, as if she had meant to say, "Don't, don't."

But the thoughtful, tender way in which Hope returned her glance, as if she understood all that the other meant, and as if there were no reason for her trouble, was unmistakable and assuring; and Mrs. Simcoe went on working and said no more.

Yet as she worked silently she could not but think of the ways of Providence; of her own story and Charles's love, and of Hope's history of the heart. "Beauty, youth, wealth, and position, then, do not secure what poverty and obscurity have," she said to herself, as she gazed at her beautiful friend and could not believe it; sometimes it seemed to her a kind of tragical justice that Hope's fate should be like her own. But it was not a justice which she desired; for her life's peace had been for the happiness of her foster-child.

"Hope, dear."

"Well, aunty."

"I hoped you would have been happy—I prayed for it, my child."

So she said on one of the days just after she had told her story, and then it seemed to her too hard that Hope should suffer.

"Why should I not be happy, aunty?"

"What should be reply? Hope Wayne had never told her that she loved Lawrence Newt—nor had Mrs. Simcoe hinted that she perceived it.

The elder woman made no reply. She only looked at the other as if she could read her soul, and only saw a sympathetic smile. Involuntarily she smiled, and Hope Wayne had caught the inscrutable sweetness of Lawrence Newt's look.

And as Hope sat also quietly working, her whole life passed before her unconsciously like a vision. She was finely influenced, excited by age and solemnity, and led on solitude upon romance; the bright apparition of manly youth that she had seen upon her dream, and was seized and caressed in imagination by almost morbid passion; the sudden shock of awaking; the training that comes of mingling with men and women; the rapid sprung from wild girlhood to self-possessed womanhood; the sensitive, sensible yielding, not to the girl's passion of romance, but to the womanhood's more profound and profoundest sympathy; and then—"he might have been my father, and he loves another woman."

Hope started and remembered, and was seized, and still her busy fingers moved, and her companion looked the tears she did not shed.

It was now the day when she was to meet him again; and this morning, for the first time, Mrs. Simcoe noticed that Hope did not sing; a soft, subdued sound, but it seemed to her sweeter than ever. Presently Hope came up and they were sitting together. A servant knocked at the door, and brought a card to Hope. She looked at it and handed it to Mrs. Simcoe.

"Mr. Abel Newt."

Her first emotion was to say that she was very much engaged, and could not see him. Her next was that something very remarkable must have brought him, and that she ought to see him.

"Say that I will be down."

Mrs. Simcoe looked inquiringly.

"A WORD IN SEASON."

"What does it mean?'

"I don't know; I am going to find out."

And Hope left the room.

CHAPTER LXXXVI.

THE LAST THROW.

ARDE NEWBY, but in hand, stood in Hope Wayne's parlor. His hair was thinner and grizzled; his face bloated, and his eyes dull. His hands had that dead, chalky color in which appetite openly paints its excesses. The hand trembled as it held the hat; and as the man stood before the mirror, he was straining his eyes at his own reflection, and, by some secret magic, he saw, as if dimly traced beside it, the figure of the boy that stood in the parlor of Pinewood—how many thousand years ago?

He heard a step, and turned.

Hope Wayne stopped, leaving the door open, bowed, and looked inquiringly at Arde. She was dressed simply in a morning dress, and her golden hair clustered and curled around the fresh beauty of her face—the rose of health.

"Did you wish to say something to me?" she asked, observing that Abel merely stared at her stupidly.

He bowed his head in assent.

"What do you wish to say?"

Her voice was as cold and remote as if she were a spirit.

Abel Newt was evidently abashed by the reception. But he moved toward her, and began in a tone of doubtful familiarity:

"Miss Hope, I—"

"Mr. Newt, you have no right to address me in that way."

"Miss Wayne, I have come to—to—"

He stopped, embarrassed, rubbing his fingers upon the palms of his hands. She looked at him steadily. He waited a few moments, then began again in a hurried tone.

"Miss Wayne, we are both older than we once were; and once, I think, we were not altogether indifferent to each other. Time has taught us many things. I find that my heart, after foolish wanderings, is still true to its first devotion. We can both view things more calmly, by not less truly, however, than we once did. I am upon the eve of a public career. I have outgrown morbid emotions, and I come to ask you if you would take time to reflect whether I might not renew my addresses; for indeed I love, and can love, no other woman."

Hope Wayne stood pale, incredulous, and confounded while Abel Newt, with some of the old fire in the eye and the old sweetness in the voice, poured out these rapid words, and advanced toward her.

"Stop, Sir!" she said, as soon as she could command herself. "Is this all you have to say?"

"Don't drive me to despair," he said, suddenly, in reply, and forcibly that Hope Wayne started. "Listen." He spoke with stern command.

"I am utterly ruined. I have no friends. I have bad habits. You can save me—will you do it?"

Hope stood before him silent. His hard black eye was fixed upon her with a look of defying appeal for help. Her state of mind for some days had been one of curious mental tension. She was inspired by a sense of responsibility—of self-sacrifice. It had seemed to her that some great work to do, something that should occupy every moment, and all her powers and thoughts, was her only hope of contentment. What it might be, what it ought to be, she had not conceived. Was it not offered now? Horrible, repulsive, degrading—yes, but was it not so much the worthier? Here stood the man she had loved in all the prime and power of his youth, full of hope and beauty and vigor—the hero that satisfied the girl's longing—and he was bent, gray, wan, shaking, utterly lost, except for her. Should she restore him to that lost manhood? Could she forgive herself if she suffered her own feelings, tastes, pride, to prevent?

While the thought whirled through her excited brain:

"Remember," he said, solemnly, "remember it is the salvation of a human soul upon which you are deciding."

There was a perfect silence for some minutes. The low, quick ticking of the clock upon the mantle was all they heard.

"I have decided," she said, at last.

"What is it?" he asked, under his breath.

"What you know it would be," she answered.

"Then you refuse?" he said, in a half-threatening tone.

"I refuse."

"Then the damnation of a soul rest upon your head forever!" he said, in a loud coarse voice, crushing his hand into black contortion.

"Have you done?" she asked, pale and calm.

"No, Hope Wayne, I have not done: I am not deceived by your smooth face and your quiet eyes. I have known long enough that you meant to martyr my Uncle Lawrence, although he is old enough to be your father. The whole world has known it and seen it. And I came to give you a chance of saving your name by showing to the world that my uncle could have familiarly because you were to marry his nephew. You refuse the chance. There was a time when you would have flown into my arms, and now you reject me. And I shall have my revenge. I warn you to beware, Mrs. Lawrence Newt! I warn you that my saintly uncle is not without misfortune, for his milksop partner, the Reverend Gabriel Bennet. I am a man at bay; and it is you who put me there; you who shall suffer, and work, and weep, and will one day remember and suffer."

He threw out the arm in unconscious rage and excitement. His thick bourse voice, his burning, bad, black eyes, his quivering hands, his bloated body were terrible to see.

"Have you done?" asked Hope Wayne, with saintly dignity.

"Yes, I have done for this time," he hissed, "but I shall cross you many a time. You and yours," he second, "that never so that you can harm me. You shall feel, but never see me. You have left me nothing but despair. And the doom of my soul be upon yours!"

He rushed from the room; and Hope Wayne stood speechless, impacted by the full force of his voice, Mrs. Simcoe had come down stairs, and the moment she saw her mistress she flew to her side. They seated themselves together upon the sofa, and Hope leaned her head upon her nanny's shoulder, and tried to utter surprise, grief, indignation, and weariness.

CHAPTER LXXXVII.

CLOTHS BREAKING.

ELLEN BENNET, sitting with the secret which Amy Waring had told her. Not the one about Amy's lover, but that about Edward's mother. The first was a mistake which she had heard the second. That swallowed up every thing else. Ellen felt that Amy Waring loved more than he loved her, she had entirely forgotten to wonder. She was only longing for liberty to tell Edward all she knew.

Meanwhile Amy went often to see Aunt Martha, whose unusual speech had so powerfully excited to the sympathy of her niece. Lawrence Newt sometimes met Amy there, but as both Amy and her aunt appeared to be wise Hope Wayne's lover, they bravely talked of every thing in the world but the one that most interested them all.

"Aunt Martha," said Amy, one day, "I really think it is time to have that old bread in which you are living and reveal you to your dear friends once more. You have been silence enough for a real crime; while your offenses, I am sure, are only imaginary."

Aunt Martha looked very silent. After some time she said,

"Do you remember what Lawrence Newt's preacher said: 'In foreign lands, outcast and forlorn, groveling with the very swine in the husk, and pining for the bread that the swine do eat; envying, defying, hating, forgetting, but never hated nor forgot.' Do you remember?"

"Perfectly, Aunt Martha."

"Well, ever since, I have seemed to be growing, somehow, more human. I believe that God loves mercy more than justice."

"Like as a father pitieth his children—" said Amy, in a low voice.

They heard a step on the stair.

"Mr. Newt," said Aunt Martha, as he knocked and came in.

"Mr. Newt," said Amy, "Aunt Martha is willing that her sister shall see her."

"Capital!" cried Lawrence Newt. "I see I shall have to give another dinner. The very idea of dinner gives Grandmother Newt a touch of economies. Now, look here! I invite you all to dinner—Aunt Martha, and you, Miss Amy, and your father, the Reverend, May Newt, and Hope Wayne; yes, and Arthur Martin and Edward Wynn; all of my young people, and we'll make Aunt Martha feel that she has never been away from her friends. Come, I am all ready to give three cheers!"

It was such an unusual hilarity—such a marked departure from the ordinary gravity and humor of his manner—that the two women were astonished, and both simultaneously came to the same conclusion:

"He is engaged to Hope Wayne."

Amy Waring was conscious that the thought made her turn pale, but she hoped neither of the others observed it. Aunt Martha leaned forward and kissed her niece. Lawrence Newt, who had not the remotest idea of their thoughts, and who was only elated by the satisfaction of knowing that Hope Wayne now understood every thing, wondered what particular occasion for kissing was offered by his remark. But he said nothing, except to insist that the dinner should take place as soon as possible. "But I wish to give myself time to compose a proper banquet for the festival," he said, with the same gayety as before; and as before, Amy, with resignation, and Aunt Martha, with regret, thought only,

"Yes—clearly: engaged to Hope Wayne."

And yet Amy and Hope had often met since the evening of Mrs. Simcoe's story. They had talked of a hundred things, and mentioned Lawrence Newt's name many times; but there was no reason why either of them should say to the other what each thought: "I love him in vain, for he loves you."

Hope Wayne had reached this conclusion alone Amy it would be hard to say. Was it only the consciousness of her feeling for him, without her consciousness of his for her, which had made her so blithe and melodious at home?

Perhaps the scales fell from her eyes in the moment she met Abel Newt that she and Lawrence could be only friends. But however it happened, she saw now, as clearly as it could be seen, that there was nothing to sure in the future as something which Amy did not suspect.

Amy Waring stepped to see Hope Wayne after her visit to Aunt Martha, her own face radiant with the prospect of her aunt's restoration to her friends. As Hope shook her hand, the cold, not help seeing in her friend's illuminated face the proof that Lawrence Newt, having gently shown to herself a certain impossibility, had at once made sure of his own and Amy's happiness.

"She is engaged to Lawrence Newt," said Hope, in her heart, as she kissed Amy's lips.

"God bless you, Amy!" she added, with as much earnestness as Amy looked surprised.

"I am very glad," said Hope, frankly.

"Why, what do you know about it?" asked Amy.

"Do you think I am blind?" said Hope.

"No; but you never see it, it was so hidden."

"It can't be hidden," said Hope, earnestly.

Amy stopped, looked inquiringly at her friend, and blushed—wondering what she meant.

"Come, Hope, at least we are hiding from each other. I came to ask you to a family festival."

"I am ready," answered Hope, with an air of quiet knowledge, and not at all surprised. Amy Waring was confused, she hardly knew why.

"Hope, what does it mean? You and Lawrence Newt—"

Hope Wayne smiled so tenderly and calmly, and with such perfect consciousness that she knew every thing Amy was about to say, that Amy stopped, and said,

"Go on," said Hope, placidly; "I want to hear it from your own lips."

Amy blushed no doubt no longer. She knew now that Hope expected to hear that she was engaged. And not with less placidity than Hope's, she said:

"Lawrence Newt invites us all to come and dine with him, because my Aunt Martha is found, and he wants to bring Aunt Bennet and her sister together."

That was all, and it was entirely unexpected to Hope, who looked as confusedly at the calm face as Amy had at the moment since, had looked at her. Then they both smiled, for they had, perhaps, some vague idea of what each had been thinking.

The same evening the Round Table met. Arde Newby was there—he did Hope Wayne. They sat together talking rapidly, but Hope did not escape seeing the unusual sadness of the artist—a sadness of manner rather than of expression. In a thousand ways there was a deference in his treatment of her which was unusual and touching. She had been conscious that he had understood what she meant when she spoke to him with an air of haughtiness about his picture. It was plain enough. It was clear enough: only he would not see what was before his eyes, nor hear what was in his ears, and so had to grope a little further until Lawrence Newt suddenly struck a light and showed him where he was.

While they were yet talking Lawrence Newt came in. He spoke to Amy Waring, and then went straight up to Hope Wayne and put out his hand with the old frank smile breaking over his face. She rose and answered his smile and laid her hand in his. They looked in each other's eyes: and Lawrence Newt saw in Hope Wayne's the beauty of a girl that long ago, as a boy, he had loved; and in his own, Hope felt that tenderness which had made her mother's happiness—and as their hands clasped, they felt how closely bound were their lives, and how changeless their regard must be.

It was but a moment. It was but a word. For the first time he said,

"Hope."

And for the first time she answered,

"Lawrence."

Amy Waring heard them. The two words seemed sharp: they pierced her heart, and she felt faint. The room swam, and on his her lip fell the blood came, and her stout heart preserved her from failing.

"It is what I knew: they are engaged."

But how was it that the manner of Lawrence Newt toward herself was never before so loyal and devoted? How was it that the quiet hilarity of the morning was not gone, but stole into his conversation with her so pointedly that she could not help feeling that it magnetized her, and that, against her will, she was more than ever cheerful? How was it that she knew it was herself who helped make that hilarity—that it was not only her friend Hope who inspired it?

They are secrets not to be told. But as they all sat around the table, and Arthur Merlin, for the first time, insisted upon reading from Byron, and in his rich melancholy voice recited

"Though the day of my destiny's over," it was clear that the cloud had lifted—that the spell of constraint was removed; and yet none of them precisely understood why.

"To-morrow, then," said Lawrence Newt as they parted.

"To-morrow," echoed Amy Waring and Hope Wayne.

Arthur Merlin pulled his cap over his eyes and sauntered slowly homeward, whistling musingly, and murmuring.

"A lot in the wilderness sinning,
That spurns to say spirit of them."

His Aunt Winnifred heard him as he came in. The good old lady had placed a fresh tract where he would be sure to see it when he entered his room. She heard his cautious step creaking up stairs, for the painter was careful to make no noise; and as she listened, she drew pictures upon her fancy of the scenes in which her boy had been mingling. It was Aunt Winnifred's fun conviction that society—that is, the great world of which she knew nothing—languished for the smile and presence of her nephew. Arthur. That very evening her gossip, Mrs. Tozer, had been in, and Aunt Winnifred had discussed her favorite theme until Mrs. Tozer went home with a vague idea that all the young and beautiful unmarried women in the city were secretly pining away for love of Arthur Merlin.

"Mercy me, now!" said Aunt Winnifred as she lay tossing to the creaking cots of her neighbor. "I wonder what poor girl's heart that wicked boy has been breaking to-night;" and she turned over and fell asleep again, to dream of youth and the days when a graceful form knelt before her, and raising its persuasive, irresistible eyes, she recognized her nephew, Arthur.

That young man reached his room and struck a light. It flashed upon a paper. He took it up eagerly, then smiled as he saw that it was a tract, and read, "A Word in Season."

"Dear Aunt Winnifred!" said he to himself; "does she think a man's griefs are like a child's bumps and bruises, to be cured by applying a piece of court plaster?"

He smiled sadly, with the profound conviction that no man had ever before really known what unhappiness was, and so tumbled into bed and fell asleep. And as he dreamed, Hope Wayne came to him and smiled, as Diana smiled in his picture upon Endymion.

"See!" she said, "I love you; look here!"

And in his dream he looked and saw a full moon in a summer sky shining upon a fresh grave upon a hill-top.

"THE DOOM OF MY SOUL BE UPON YOURS!"

ADVERTISEMENTS.

JONAS WHITCOMB'S
REMEDY FOR
ASTHMA

Is worthy the attention of all who suffer from this distressing complaint. The late JONAS WHITCOMB, of Boston, visited Europe a few years since for the benefit of his health, which was much impaired by frequent attacks of Spasmodic Asthma.

While in Germany, an eminent physician became interested in his case, and promised him relief. He followed the treatment ordered, and, to his surprise and joy, his asthma almost entirely disappeared. He procured the recipe which had accomplished so much for him, brought it with him to this country, and it became the property of the present proprietors. It contains no poisonous or injurious properties whatever; and as a fact any take it with perfect safety.

[Letter from Clergyman.]

Asthma.
Asthma.

WATERBORO', Me., May 12, 1857.

MESSRS. JEROME BURNETT & CO.:—I take pleasure in stating the wonderful effects of "WHITCOMB'S REMEDY FOR ASTHMA" on my wife. She has been for months at times in a year she was brought to the very gates of death, requiring two or three watchers, sometimes for several days and nights in succession. At one time she was so far gone that her physicians gave her over as incurable. I consulted numerous physicians in the highest celebrity, and received their advice. At length I heard of "Whitcomb's Remedy." It acted like a charm; it enabled her to sleep quietly in a few minutes, and nearly broke up the disease. I am a Methodist Clergyman, stationed here. I shall be happy to answer any inquiries respecting her case.

Yours truly, KIMBALL HADLEY.

Prepared by JOSEPH BURNETT & CO., Boston, and sold by all Druggists.

One Dollar per Bottle.

Asthma.

From Rev. D. Lord, Port Jervis, Pa.—"An old lady of our congregation has been severely afflicted with Asthma for many years, and has tried a multiplicity of prescriptions, with little or no effect. My wife sent her a part of one of the Universal Pectorals,—called a few days we heard that she found great relief from their use, and to-day she sent us a note stating that she wishes to procure more: we had only one left but could not refuse it." Invariably Coughs, Colds, or Cough Lozenges are sold throughout the United States.

LONGFELLOW'S EVANGELINE.

A most brilliant and charming Piano Forte piece under the above title, composed by Joseph Liebich, has just been published by the undersigned. Price 50 cents. Copies sent by mail, postage paid.

FIRTH, POND & CO., 547 Broadway, N. Y.

HARPER & BROTHERS,
Franklin Square, New York,
PUBLISH THIS DAY—
HARPER'S
ILLUMINATED AND NEW
PICTORIAL BIBLE.

EMBELLISHED WITH
Sixteen Hundred Historical Engravings,
Exclusive of an Initial Letter to each Chapter.

By J. A. ADAMS,

More than Fourteen Hundred of which are from Original Designs,

By J. G. CHAPMAN.

This magnificent work is printed from the standard copy of the American Bible Society, and contains Maps, Glossarial References, the Apocrypha, a Concordance, Chronological Tables, List of Proper Names, Marginal Readings, Tables of Weights, Measures, &c. The large Pronunciations, Close to the Old and New Testaments, Family Record, Presentation Plate, Historical Illustrations, and Notes at the foot of the Chapters, Ornamental Borders, &c., &c., by Original Designs, made expressly for this work by J. G. CHAPMAN, and cut on wood by the best artists, which there are numerous engravings from designs by distinguished modern Artists in France and England, to which a full index is given.

TERMS.

Morocco, gilt edges, beveled and paneled sides..	$25 00
Morocco extra, gilt edges	22 00
Full Calf embossed, gilt edges	20 00
Full Calf, marbled edges, black stamp	18 00
Full Roan, marbled edges	16 00

Cloth and furnished by Express on receipt of the price.

Throw away your Wigs!—A humane growth of soft, young hair speedily follows the use of JUDGE HAYNES'S EAR ANOINTMENT. It is a sure remedy for a nervous-looking nursery lot, and a preventive of baldness. It also changes gray hairs and beards to their natural youthful color. It is not a dye, and is perfectly harmless. Sold by all Druggists, and by JUDGE HAYNES, Patentee, 704 Chestnut street, Philadelphia.

"KISS-ME-QUICK."—Dupuy's universally valied Perfume, distilled from Fragrant Tulips. E. DUPUY, Chemist, 509 Broadway, corner of Houston Street.

HARPER & BROTHERS,
Franklin Square, New York,
PUBLISH THIS DAY—
THE
DIARY OF A SAMARITAN.
BY A MEMBER OF THE HOWARD ASSOCIATION OF NEW ORLEANS.
12mo, Muslin, $1 00.

The author of this very interesting volume was a prominent and early member of the Howard Association of New Orleans. He gives a history of the operations of the society, with numerous incidents and anecdotes, and descriptive of cases that came under his sick-portrayal observations. Many of these are deeply interesting, reminding one of "The Diary of a Physician."

☞ Sent by Mail, postage paid, on receipt of price.

DR. SWEET'S INFALLIBLE LINIMENT cures rheumatism and sore throat.

SOMETHING LATELY NEW.
Phalon's
SNOW WHITE
Oriental Cream,
—FOR—
Whitening and Beautifying the Complexion, and Removing all Tan, Pimples, Freckles, Blotches, Sunburn and Curing all Diseases of the Skin.

PHALON'S SNOW WHITE ORIENTAL CREAM is a delightful compound, highly and delicately scented, to be used in the Toilet, imparting health, beauty and purity to the skin. It will effectually remove TAN, FRECKLES, PIMPLES, and all blemishes of the skin, and will prevent the shrinking and becoming spotted. It will give the skin a soft and delicate appearance, and, by using this as directions, the skin will become entirely free from all imperfections.

The Money will be refunded in every SNOW WHITE ORIENTAL CREAM, a new article of their own invention, and for which they have taken a patent, provided that there is nothing in its composition that is at all injurious, it being entirely different from any other preparation ever made.

Directions accompany each bottle; but for the purpose of showing all how easily it is applied, we publish these

DIRECTIONS.

Shake the bottle well before using the SNOW WHITE with a sponge, and when dry wipe with a clean towel or flannel.

For sale by all Druggists and Fancy Dealers, and by the manufacturers,

PHALON & SON,
No. 2 Astor House, New York.

For the use of Glee Clubs, Singing Classes, Seminaries, and the Home CIRCLE.

The Family Circle Glee Book, Vol. 2d, is now ready. It contains the Anvil Chorus, Shells of the Ocean, Gentle Annie, Come to the Fairies Flower, Home, Home to Love, Star of the Evening, Gently sighs the Breeze, and Two Hundred Others, and, without the aid of Instrumental Pieces arranged for four voices, with full accompaniments for the Piano Forte or Melodeon.

Price $1 50.

Copies sent by mail on receipt of the marked price.

FIRTH, POND & CO.,
547 Broadway, N. Y.

Ladd, Webster & Co.,
INVITE ATTENTION TO THEIR
IMPROVED TIGHT-STITCH
Sewing Machines,
WHICH FOR BEAUTY AND SIMPLICITY OF CONSTRUCTION, AND PERFECTION IN WORKING, ARE UNEQUALED BY ANY.

500 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.
17 SUMMER STREET, BOSTON.
620 CHESTNUT STREET, PHILADELPHIA.
202 BALTIMORE STREET, BALTIMORE.
80 WEST FOURTH STREET, CINCINNATI.

A New Picture for the Stereoscope!!
"GOOD FOR A COLD."

Just received by the Persia, a choice Assortment of entirely New Views—Groups, Landscapes, &c., &c., and at greatly reduced prices, at the New York Depot of the LONDON STEREOSCOPIC CO.,
594 Broadway.

Great Reduction in Prices at Genin's Hat Establishment.—GENIN'S NEW CHRISTMAS HOLIDAY VOTARIES' CATALOGUE.—AN ADMIRABLE HOLIDAY.—GREAT REDUCTION IN PRICES.—THE LATEST BALLAD.—CHRISTMAS PRESENTS IN GLOVES AND UMBRELLAS.—GENIN'S LADIES' GAITERS AND SLIPPERS.—IN CHILDREN'S LEGGINGS.—IN CHILDREN'S CLOTH CAPS.—REDUCED IN SMALL BOYS' SUITS.—IN INFANTS' WARDROBES.—THE LATEST STYLES.—FRENCH FLANNELS.—FRENCH BOMBS DE CHAMBRE.—IN LADIES' UNDERSACQUES.—FRENCH MERINOS IN BRIDAL COSTUME.—FRENCH DRESSING OF LADIES' BONNETS.—IN CHILDREN'S BONNETS.—IN CHILDREN'S FANCY HATS.—IN LADIES' HEAD-DRESSES.—FRENCH DRESSING IN LADIES' FURS.—IN CHILDREN'S FURS.—IN GENTLEMEN'S FURS.—IN THE COLLARS.—IN GENTS' SILK CLOTHS.—IN GENTS' FUR CAPS.—FRENCH CLOTHS AND VELVET CAPS.—NEWS AND BOYS' SOFT HATS.—GENIN'S UNDER HATS.—GENIN'S BAZAAR, Nos. 507 and 513 Broadway.

THE Atlantic Monthly.
Commencement of a New Volume.

With the number for JANUARY, 1860, the ATLANTIC will enter upon its third year of existence.

FIFTH VOLUME.

In making this announcement the Publishers think it proper to say, simply, that no change will be made in the general plan of the work, and that all the writers whose contributions have established it in the popular favor will continue to make it their medium of communication with the public: and that the relations of the publishers with the public will be conducted in such a manner as to enable them to add materially to the variety, interest, and value of the work.

They have great pleasure in announcing that the number for JANUARY will contain the first chapters of a

NEW ROMANCE,
ENTITLED
THE PROFESSOR'S STORY;
Written expressly for its pages, by
OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES,

To be continued in succeeding numbers of the Magazine throughout the year.

TERMS.—Single numbers, 75 cents. Three Dollars per year, postage paid to any part of the United States.

CLUBS.—Two copies, Five Dollars; Five copies, Ten Dollars; Eleven copies, Twenty Dollars,—the subscribers in all cases to receive their copies via the nearest City, Clergymen, Teachers, and Postmasters, will receive the Magazine at Two Dollars per year, as heretofore.

Subscriptions may commence with any number; and when no time is specified, they will commence with the number next issued.

All orders should be addressed to

TICKNOR & FIELDS, Publishers,
135 Washington Street, Boston.

FINKLE & LYON'S SEWING MACHINES
—Warranted to give better satisfaction than any other machine in the market, or money refunded.
N.B.—FREE EMBROIDERY TO ALL.
No. 502 Broadway.

Phalon's Instantaneous Hair Dye.
Phalon's Blush of Roses.
Phalon's Bloom of Youth.
Phalon's Liquid Rouge.
Phalon's Lily White.
Phalon's Extract of Sarsaparilla.
Phalon's Cocoa Cream.
Phalon's Cocoa Soap.
Phalon's Cocoa Oil.
Phalon's Cocoa Pomade.
Phalon's Cocoa Wash Balls.
Phalon's Cocoa Shaving Cream.
Phalon's Cocoa Shaving Soap.
Phalon's Cocoa Tooth Powder.
Phalon's Cocoa Tooth Wash.
Phalon's Cocoa Tooth Brushes.
Phalon's Cocoa Hair Brushes.
Phalon's Cocoa Nail Brushes.
Phalon's Cocoa Flesh Brushes.
Phalon's Cocoa Clothes Brushes.
Phalon's Cocoa Hair Combs.
Phalon's Cocoa Pocket Combs.
Phalon's Cocoa Dressing Combs.
Phalon's Cocoa Shaving Combs.
Phalon's Cocoa Whisker Combs.
Phalon's Cocoa Nail Scissors.
Phalon's Cocoa Cuticle Knife.
Phalon's Cocoa Nail Knife.
Phalon's Cocoa Nail Polish.
Phalon's Cocoa Nail Powder.
Phalon's Cocoa Nail Pomade.
Phalon's Cocoa Nail Wash.
Phalon's Cocoa Nail Bleach.
Phalon's Cocoa Nail Dye.
Phalon's Cocoa Nail Cream.
Phalon's Cocoa Nail Oil.
Phalon's Cocoa Nail Soap.
Phalon's Cocoa Nail Brushes.
Phalon's Cocoa Nail Scissors

Worcester's Quarto Dictionary. The Great American Standard

Get the Best.

FIRST EDITION FOR SUBSCRIBERS ONLY.

The Library Edition of WORCESTER'S QUARTO DICTIONARY is now in press, and will be ready for delivery to subscribers in a few days. The copies will be delivered in the order of subscription. We shall publish an edition for the retail, which will be ready as soon as the copies of the Library Edition have been distributed. We have upwards of now on our list.

FIVE THOUSAND SUBSCRIBERS

It will be completed in about 1,750 pages, illustrated by over 1000 wood-cuts, beautifully executed. The Synonyms and Illustrations are placed in juxtaposition to the words to which they belong, in the body of the text. It will contain a full vocabulary of the words now used in Literature, Art, and Science, together with such local words and provincialisms as are likely to be found in the United States and Canada.

The work will also contain copious pronouncing vocabularies of Geographical and Proper Names, a full collection of Phrases and Quotations from Foreign Languages, a Key to the Pronunciation of Classical and Scripture Proper Names, a complete list of Abbreviations used in writing and printing, and synonyms, antonyms, and practical lessons on the Origin, Formation, and Etymology of the English Language. Orthography, Pronunciation, English Grammar, and other important subjects.

The new and authentic etymologies, the conciseness and completeness of the definitions, the clearness with which the different shades of meaning in synonyms are distinguished, and the accordance necessary to be had in all its departments, give it a claim in the highest degree reliable to public favor.

WILLIAM ELLIS JEFFERY,
Treasurer of the Publication Fund.

I concur with the opinion of Mr. Bryant.
WASHINGTON IRVING.

Sunnyside, May 14, 1859.

"This large Dictionary, now in course of publication, will be in every respect superior to any one existing of the English language."
JOSEPH G. COGSWELL.

Astor Library, May 5, 1859.

Specimen pages will be sent by mail on application.

The Library Edition, on extra fine paper, and bound in half Turkey morocco, will be ready in a few days.

HICKLING, SWAN & BREWER,
13 Washington Street, Boston.

Forty Dollars per Month.

500 Agents wanted to travel and solicit orders for the celebrated Wheeler & Wilson Sewing Machine, at a salary $80 per month, with all expenses paid. For sample machine, and full particulars, address, at once, the manufacturers, at their principal office, 505 Broadway, New York.

ABRIDGED EDITION OF

RICHARDSON'S METHOD SCHOOL,

WITH American Fingering. Price $3.

The Modern School for the Piano, by Nathan Richardson, is highly recommended by Thalberg, Dreyschock, Mason, Bird, Webb, Wollenhaupt, Satter, and a host of others, equally well known, and whose opinion on Musical matters is without question.

Full Edition, with Foreign Fingering.....$3.
Abridged do., with American Fingering.....$2.
Sent to any part of the United States on receipt of the price.

Published by RUSSELL & TOLMAN,
No. 291 Washington Street, Boston.

Wistar's Balsam of Wild Cherry.

This remedy has long been cherished by the community for its remarkable efficacy in relieving, healing, and curing the most obstinate, painful, and long-standing affections of the Throat, Breast, and Lungs. DR. WISTAR'S COUGHS, WHOOPING COUGH, CROUP, ASTHMA, INFLAMMATION OF THE LUNGS, and BRONCHITIS, which have long yielded to its magic influence, when all other known means have failed.

The great popularity of this Balsam, which has now become a household word, proves that the past has produced no remedy approaching it in value, and the present is not likely to add materially present one of equal value.

To guard against Counterfeits, of which there are several varieties, see that each bottle has the written signature of "I. Davis," as well as the printed name of the Proprietors, "Seth W. Fowle & Co., Boston," on the outside wrapper.

Sold by Druggists and Dealers everywhere.

Wistar's Balsam of Wild Cherry.

BUY your FURS OF WILLIAMS, No. 293 FULTON STREET, BROOKLYN.

Ladies' Muffs—Gentlemen's Caps.

HUNGARIAN WINES.—A parcel of superior RED and WHITE HUNGARIAN WINES, in wood and in glass, for sale by

CHARLES P. LOOSEY,
No. 2 Hanover Square, Room No. 6.

SANDS' SARSAPARILLA,

For chronic constitutional diseases, such as Rheumatism, King's Evil, Scrofula, obstinate Ulcerations, Sore Throat, Tetter, Enlargement and Pain of the Bones, and other similar diseases, this preparation will be found a most

EFFECTUAL REMEDY.

Prepared and sold by A. B. & D. SANDS, Druggists, 100 Fulton Street, New York.

IF WHISKERS AND MUSTACHES won't grow upon your face, use my eloquent contebalmed 1862, which will force them to grow six weeks from the first application, and without stain or injury to the skin. Sent free, by mail, post paid, for 25 cents. Address
DR. F. BRUNSWICK,
No. 503 Broadway, New York.

Fine Gold Jewelry
Imported.

Osborne, Boardman & Townsend,
527 Broadway,
Corner of Spring Street,

INVITE THE INSPECTION OF THE PUBLIC TO their display of FINE GOLD IMPORTED JEWELRY, comprising and the NEWEST PATTERNS to be found elsewhere,

ENGRAVED,
ENAMELLED,
TURQUOISE,
GARNET,
and
PEARL

FULL AND HALF SETS, BRACELETS, NECKLACES, CHAINS, CHATELAINES, BROOCHES, EARRINGS, LOCKETS, SCARF PINS, SLEEVE BUTTONS, STUDS, &c., &c., &c.

Marksixie Steel Jewelry,
Fine and Real Coral Sets from Naples,
Full Garnet Sets from Leipsic,
Black Enamelled Jewelry.

We can confidently say that our assortment of FINE IMPORTED JEWELRY is more complete than can be found elsewhere. It was selected in Europe during the present season by Mr. OSBORNE.

Before purchasing elsewhere, we request an inspection of our assortment.

ALSO, OUR USUAL ASSORTMENT OF
Rich Paris Fancy Articles,
GENEVA MUSIC BOXES, &c.

Harper's
Holiday Pictorial
Now Ready.

The most beautiful Pictorial Sheet ever issued.

PRICE SIX CENTS.

Sent by mail anywhere in the United States on receipt of the price.

HARPER & BROTHERS, Franklin Square, N. Y.

REMOVAL.

JAMES BOGARDUS,
Architect in Iron, Engineer, Constructor, and Patentee of Iron Buildings,
Has removed his Manufactory and Warehouse of BOGARDUS'S IMPROVED UNIVERSAL MILL, Machine Shops and Foundry of WHITE and IRA MILL, In Harlem Railroad Depot, Office No. 56 Centre Street, New York.
Iron Building corner Centre and Duane Sts., formerly occupied, has been removed to 79 Walker Street.

PIANO FORTES.

RAVEN, BACON & CO.,
No. 1 Union Square, corner of Fourth Avenue, Manufacture and Keep for Sale Pianos of their own make, with the Latest Improvements, including the Patent Agraffe Treble, Overstrung Scale, Iron Frame, Full Metal Action, and Circular End Grand Scale, which for power, purity, and evenness of tone, elasticity of touch, and durability of construction, are unsurpassed by any manufactured in this city, viz.: The value of the paper can be ascertained by a single trial. Those who are in the habit of trying to ascertain how little people would really know on a subject, imagine if they had to write on that subject three sides. In this respect, the arrangements for the paper are peculiarly favorable to the writer. It is a tremendous the result of this best article at home; and, as in the case of the Sewing Machine, the demand for it must increase. It will moreover, in order to present its columns with a complete literature, from week to week, continue to transfer to its pages the best and most generally interesting articles from the English and French journals, just as the daily papers transfer to their columns the news of the European steamers. In a word, the subscriber to HARPER'S WEEKLY may rely on finding in its pages the best, most interesting, most varied, well-organized, and well-piloted picture of every memorable event which occurs in the world at all worth recording, and the critical attention of the people will be directed to

HIGHLY IMPORTANT TO BOTH SEXES, Married or Single, in health or disease—
HOMEOPATHIC AND ALLOPATHIC PHYSICIANS, fifth edition, over 400 pages, fine cloth, and above 100 Engravings, Health in Marriage. 413 pages, 78 Engravings. Price 50 cents, in paper or $1 00, stamps.
The Science and Art of Diseases of the Heart, Stomach, Liver, Bowels, and Kidneys; on Apoplexy, Palsy, and Physiology, why we grow old and how to cause disease. 121 pages, 6 engravings. Price 25 cents, in paper, by mail, giving name, state, county town, and post office.

Two Works Valuable to the Sick or Well.

Sent by mail, no pay expected until received, read, and approved.

Address Dr. S. S. FITCH, 714 Broadway, New York.

1st. SIX LECTURES on the cause, prevention, and cure of Long Life, Health, and Skin Diseases; Rheumatism, and Male and Female complaints. On the mode of Preserving Health to 100 years. 413 pages, 78 Engravings. Price 50 cents, in paper or $1 00, stamps.

2d. The Science and Art of Diseases of the Heart, Stomach, Liver, Bowels, and Kidneys; on Apoplexy, Palsy, and Physiology, why we grow old and how to cause disease. 121 pages, 6 engravings. Price 25 cents, in paper, by mail, giving name, state, county town, and post office.

Piano Fortes,

Of the newest style, finest tone, and lowest rates.
HALLET, DAVIS & CO.'S Manufactories,
Warerooms No. 99 Prince, near Broadway.

Singer's Sewing Machines.

SINGER'S No. 2 SEWING MACHINE, $100.
SINGER'S No. 1 SEWING MACHINE, $65.
HEMMING CLOTHES HOOKS and TWO-PENCE.

Singer's Family Sewing Machines at $50 and $75 are capable of performing, in the best style, all the sewing of a private family.

Send for a circular of I. M. Singer & Co.'s Gazette, which contains full and reliable information about prices, sizes, etc., of Sewing Machines, and will be supplied gratis.

I. M. SINGER & CO.
No. 458 Broadway, New York.

361 BROADWAY 539

BRIDAL OUTFITS,
Tucker's Flowers, Jewellery, and Miscellaneous Items,
Are all reliable.

A Beautiful Gentleman's Hair-Cutting Saloon

of Youth or Liquid Fruit is the best article in existence for preserving, invigorating, and restoring the hair. Its wonderful effects may be seen and tried gratis at LAIRD'S ladies' hair-dressing establishment, 5 Astor way.

American Guano.

TO FARMERS AND DEALERS

In Guano. This Guano from Jarvis Island, in the Pacific Ocean, which has been proved to be the most valuable fertilizer ever discovered, is offered for sale at wholesale and retail at less than two thirds the price of Peruvian Guano. For pamphlet, apply to ALFRED L. ELY, American Guano Co., 66 William street, New York.

Mr Every Number of HARPER'S MAGAZINE contains from 128 to 144 pages—and from one third to one half more reading than any other in the country.

HARPER'S
NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE.

NUMBER CXVII. CONTENTS. JANUARY, 1860.

HOLIDAYS IN COSTA RICA.—II. SAN JOSE. By THOMAS ANTHONY MORAHAN.
Illustrated by Fourteen Engravings.
A LAY OF THE LAST HANDLE.
RURAL PICTURES. DRAWN BY POETS CRAYON.
Illustrated by Twenty Engravings.
A PIPE OF TOBACCO.
Illustrated by Seventeen Engravings.
MRS. ANTRON'S CHRISTMAS PRESENT.
THE POET'S REGRET.
THE ATOMS OF CHLADNI.
CHILDREN ON CRUTCHES. By "HARRY CRINGO."
MISS VINTON OF TALLAHASSEE.
BURIAL OF YORKTOWN.
HOW THE SNOW MELTED ON MOUNT WASHINGTON.
THE THREE GREAT VOYAGES.
THE RISE OF NEW ORLEANS.—A BALLAD OF LOUISIANA.
STORY, OR, THREE STORIES IN ONE.
A CHRISTMAS HYMN.
NOTICE OF A NUMBER OF CURRENT EVENTS.
LITERARY NOTICES.
HARPER'S BALLAD.
EDITORS EASY CHAIR.
LITERARY BY HUMBUG.
EDITORS DRAWER.
HARPER'S NOTE TO THE WAY.
THE INKSTANDISTER.
LIBRARY OF LITERATURE.
ILLUSTRATIONS.—Bull Costume.—Under-Sleeve.—Collar.

TERMS.

One Copy for One Year.....$3 00
Two Copies for One Year.....5 00
Three or more Copies for One Year (each) 2 00
Additional Copies may be obtained at the rate of TWO DOLLARS per Copy.
HARPER'S WEEKLY and HARPER'S MAGAZINE, together—One Year, $5.

The Postage upon "HARPER'S MAGAZINE" must be paid at the office where it is received. The Postage is Thirty-six Cents a year.

HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A FIRST-CLASS ILLUSTRATED PAPER.
THE MOST ATTRACTIVE
FAMILY NEWSPAPER IN THE WORLD.
LIVE! SEND A NUMBER! $2.00 a YEAR.

The First Number of the Twenty-Second Volume of HARPER'S WEEKLY will appear on the 6th JANUARY, 1860. This paper now CIRCULATES OVER 130,000 COPIES EVERY WEEK, and has been said, nearly half of which will be issued for reference, and preservation. It has now reached proportions which seem to state that its popularity which HARPER'S WEEKLY has obtained will enable it to maintain the high rank which it has held to the future.

It is the purpose of the Union to render HARPER'S WEEKLY, in the first place, and, before any thing else, a newspaper—a pictorial history of current events, equal to the best daily press in completeness of its records, and to the daily press in combining the citations with text. The Editors have already attained that rare, but necessary position—unbiased with zeal. The illustrations in the THIRD VOLUME will be found to be of a higher order than in any former volume of the past year has been related and illustrated with the largest of Likenesses of WEEKLY. They would cover especially, in this connection, to the Union and the Constitution, and the Laws, and to the Rights of Authority, and Liberty, and Order, the Principles of Religion, and Morality, and Virtue, etc. The value of the paper can be ascertained by a single trial. Those who are in the habit of trying to ascertain how little people would really know on a subject, imagine if they had to write on that subject three sides. In this respect, the arrangements for the paper are peculiarly favorable to the writer. It is a tremendous the result of this best article at home; and, as in the case of the Sewing Machine, the demand for it must increase. It will moreover, in order to present its columns with a complete literature, from week to week, continue to transfer to its pages the best and most generally interesting articles from the English and French journals, just as the daily papers transfer to their columns the news of the European steamers. In a word, the subscriber to HARPER'S WEEKLY may rely on finding in its pages the best, most interesting, most varied, well-organized, and well-piloted picture of every memorable event which occurs in the world at all worth recording, and the critical attention of the people will be directed to HARPER'S WEEKLY will continue, as heretofore, to publish the best Tales that can be procured from the best writers. Among the Tales already engaged are the following:

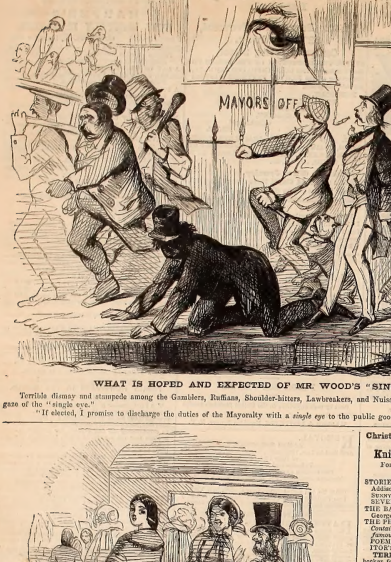
A Tale of Two Cities, by CHARLES DICKENS, author of "David Copperfield," etc.
Framley Parsonage, by ANTHONY TROLLOPE, author of "Barchester Towers," etc.
Romola, by GEORGE ELIOT, author of "Adam Bede," etc.
The Cloister and the Hearth, by CHARLES READE, author of "Peg Woffington," etc.
Griffith Gaunt, by CHARLES READE, author of "Peg Woffington," etc.
Hard Cash, by CHARLES READE, author of "Peg Woffington," etc.
Lord Lynne's Choice, by MRS. HENRY WOOD, author of "East Lynne," etc.
Orley Farm, by ANTHONY TROLLOPE, author of "Barchester Towers," etc.
Rachel Ray, by ANTHONY TROLLOPE, author of "Barchester Towers," etc.
Can You Forgive Her? by ANTHONY TROLLOPE, author of "Barchester Towers," etc.
The Small House at Allington, by ANTHONY TROLLOPE, author of "Barchester Towers," etc.
The Last Chronicle of Barset, by ANTHONY TROLLOPE, author of "Barchester Towers," etc.
The Bertrams, by ANTHONY TROLLOPE, author of "Barchester Towers," etc.
The Three Clerks, by ANTHONY TROLLOPE, author of "Barchester Towers," etc.
The Warden, by ANTHONY TROLLOPE, author of "Barchester Towers," etc.
Miss Mackenzie, by ANTHONY TROLLOPE, author of "Barchester Towers," etc.
The Claverings, by ANTHONY TROLLOPE, author of "Barchester Towers," etc.
Doctor Thorne, by ANTHONY TROLLOPE, author of "Barchester Towers," etc.
Castle Richmond, by ANTHONY TROLLOPE, author of "Barchester Towers," etc.
The Bachelors of Salamanca, by GEORGE ELIOT, author of "Adam Bede," etc.
Mr. Gilfil's Love Story, by GEORGE ELIOT, author of "Adam Bede," etc.
Scenes of Clerical Life, by GEORGE ELIOT, author of "Adam Bede," etc.
Silas Marner, by GEORGE ELIOT, author of "Adam Bede," etc.
Felix Holt, by GEORGE ELIOT, author of "Adam Bede," etc.
The Mill on the Floss, by GEORGE ELIOT, author of "Adam Bede," etc.
Adam Bede, by GEORGE ELIOT, author of "Adam Bede



WHAT IS HOPED AND EXPECTED OF MR. WOOD'S "SINGLE EYE."

Terrible dismay and stampede among the Gamblers, Ruffians, Shoulder-hitters, Lawbreakers, and Nuisances of every kind, under the searching gaze of the "single eye."

"If elected, I promise to discharge the duties of the Mayoralty with a single eye to the public good."—FERNANDO WOOD'S Circular.

PRETTY DRESSMAKER (trying on the Cloak). "Don't you think this would suit the lady, sir?" (Little Bruce begins to think shopping rather pleasant after all.)

FOR EVERY LIBRARY.

WASHINGTON
IRVING'S
WRITINGS.
21 vols.

BAYARD TAYLOR'S
WRITINGS.
9 vols.

Priced lists furnished on application to
G. P. PUTNAM, 115 Nassau Street.

PHOTOGRAPH ARTISTS.

Full and valuable instruction in Coloring, both in Water and Oil Colors. Photographs, &c., will be found in the new book on Art, called "ART RECREATIONS." Besides these, there are equally valuable chapters on other desirable styles. Every artist and every teacher who will examine this book, (which will be found at all the book and print stores,) will be satisfied of its value to them.

Price $1 50.

J. E. TILTON & CO., Boston,
PUBLISHERS.

ENGLISH PICKLES REDUCED in PRICE —Send for a priced list of our English and Scotch Provisions. RICHARDSON & McLEOD, 100 Maiden Lane, New York.

More Popular than ever! Its Sale Unprecedented!

LYON'S KATHAIRON
FOR THE HAIR

Is, beyond question, the finest and most popular article ever made. Nothing has ever given such universal satisfaction. It restores the Hair, preserves and beautifies it, and removes all Dandruff, &c. If you do not use it, try it. Sold everywhere for 75 cents per bottle.
HEATH, WYNKOOP & CO.

PRINCE IMPERIAL CHAMPAGNE,

FROM EPERNAY,
DEVENOGE & CO FRANCE.

A Wine of rare quality, at a moderate price. Sold at the PRINCIPAL HOTELS, and by ALL THE LEADING DEALERS throughout the country.
E. V. HAUGHWOUT, Sole Importer,
485, 490, and 492 BROADWAY,
corner of Broome Street, N. Y.

ASTHMA!—From Whitcomb's Remedy!—Prepared from a German recipe, obtained by the late Jonas Whitcomb, in Europe. It is well known to have alleviated this disorder in his case, when all other appliances of medical skill had been abandoned by him in despair. In no case of purely Asthmatic character, has it failed to give immediate relief, and it has effected many permanent cures.

Christmas!! Merry Making!! New Year!!

Knickerbocker Magazine, ready.
FOR JANUARY, BEGINNING THE 55TH VOLUME.
Contents, American and Original.
STORIES and PICTURES of the HUDSON. By T. Addison Richards. SEVENTY Splendid Illustrations of SNOWDEN, IRVINGTON, TARRYTOWN, &c.—SIX by SEVEN. A Christmas Story. By Miss PRESCOTT.
THE BATTLE of FORT MOULTRIE. By the Hon. George Bancroft.
THE PHYSICAL DECLINE of AMERICAN WOMEN! Containing but titnes the outspoken truth of Mobile's famous Li'Hunter unheed its sentimentalities.—POEMS, SKETCHES, and an INCOMPARABLE EDITOR'S TABLE.
TERMS.—To every $3 00 Subscriber to the Knickerbocker for 1860, enclosing 13 cents extra in stamps, will be sent, free of postage, a copy of the new and splendid Engraving of Merry-Making in the Olden Time.
25 by 19½ inches in size, containing 30 figures, and being by far the finest PREMIUM of the kind ever offered in the Country. ☞ Six copies of the Knickerbocker and Engraving will be sent for five Subscriptions ($15 00). Six copies of HARPER'S WEEKLY included for five Subscriptions of $5 12 each ($25 00).
AGENTS WANTED in every county in the UNITED STATES. Terms unusually liberal.
JOHN A. GRAY, 16 and 18 Jacob Street, New York.

THE MINISTER'S WOOING. Cloth gilt, $2 00.
BEULAH. Elegant Cloth, gilt, $2 00.
THE POOL OF QUALITY. By Brooks. Half Calf, $4 00.
PRENTICEANA. $1 40.
CAROLINA SPORTS. Six Illustrations. $1 00.
The Publishers will send either of the above by mail, post-paid, on receipt of the price.
DERBY & JACKSON, Publishers, New York.

Mother Goose For Grown Folks.
A NEW CHRISTMAS BOOK.
One volume, with Frontispiece by Billings, elegantly printed on tinted paper. Price in Boards, 75 cents; in Muslin, $1 00.
. Sold everywhere, and sent by mail, postage free, on receipt of the price, by RUDD & CARLETON, 130 Grand Street, New York.

WARM CLOTHING.
We now offer large assortments of Fall and Winter Clothing, just manufactured, in our best styles, consisting in part of
ESQUIMAUX BEAVERS,
MOSCOW BEAVERS,
ELDER DOWN BEAVERS,
NAGENIE BEAVERS,
CASTOR BEAVERS,
CLARENDON BEAVERS,
DREADNAUGHT BEAVERS.
Also, complete suits of all styles of CASSIMERE and Beaver suits, and all the late styles Velvet and Cashmere Vestings, &c.
BOYS' CLOTHING
AND FURNISHING GOODS
in great variety, at the lowest prices of the trade.
D. DEVLIN & CO.,
Nos. 326, 328, and 330 Broadway.

Café de Costa Rica
C&C
GREAT CURIOSITY—Particulars sent free. Agents wanted. SEAR & CLARK, Biddeford, Me.

Spalding's Prepared Glue!
"A Stitch in Time saves Nine."
ECONOMY! Dispatch!
Save the Pieces!
Useful in every house for mending Furniture, Toys, Crockery, Glass-ware, &c.
Wholesale Depot, No. 30 Platt Street, New York.
Address HENRY C. SPALDING & CO.,
Box No. 3,600 N.Y.
Put up for Dealers in Cases containing four, eight, and twelve dozen—a beautiful Lithograph Show-Card accompanying each package.

A Lie Refuted.
"Who dyed your hair?" "It isn't dyed."
The indignant gentleman replied.
"Twas dead before, but now it's alive,
HEMMETER'S INIMITABLE made it thrive."
"Who said 'twas dyed?—he lied!
With him it was the truth that died.
The Wash invigorates and brings dead hair to life,
And he who doubts my word can ask my wife."
This "Inimitable" Restorative will return gray hair to its original color, stop its falling out, and bring it out on bald heads. Sold everywhere.
W. E. HAGAN & CO., Proprietors, Troy, N. Y.

DR. J. B. MARCHISI'S
Celebrated Uterine Catholicon,
For the Relief and Cure of Suffering Females.
Climate and the normal habits of female life superinduce a variety of diseases which this Catholicon will counteract and cure. It can be relied upon in any case of Painful, Suppressed, or Irregular Menstruation, Prolapsus Uteri, Leucorrhœa, Ulceration of the Womb, Faintness, Lassitude, &c. When every thing else has failed, this article is never known to exert a harmful influence. No suffering female should neglect it. Pamphlet, with full symptoms, treatment, letters, &c., sent free by mail, or delivered by any Agent. It is sold in every town, or sent by express. Be cautious of an imitation, somewhat similar in name, as no certificates are sent, &c. Address BARNES & PARK, No. 13 Park Row, N. Y.; J. D. PARK, Cincinnati or Chicago; WEEKS & POTTER, Boston; or CALLENDER & CO., Philad.
J. B. MARCHISI, M.D., Utica, N. Y.

Overcoats—$3 50, $4 00, $5 00, $6 50, $10 and $25.
HOUSECOATS—$3 50, $5 00, $4 50, $6 50 & $10.
PANTS and VESTS—$1 to $10. Gents' Furnishing Goods, at GEO. A. HUNTER & CO.'S
Mammoth Clothing Stores,
Nos. 290 and 292 Bowery.

READY DECEMBER 10th.
A NEW BOOK
BY THE AUTHOR OF "GRACE HAMILTON'S SCHOOL DAYS," &c., &c.
The Wife's Trials and Triumphs.
One Volume, 12mo, printed on Rose-tinted Paper, and handsomely bound. Price, $1 00.
This is a charming story. It describes in vivid language the wayward traits and sufferings of which the faithful wife is subjected, and her final triumph over all. It is written in a natural and sprightly style. It is a book in which all will be interested, and can not fail to do good wherever it is read.

Jacob Abbott's New Book.
The Florence Stories.
VOL. I. FLORENCE AND JOHN.
Illustrated from Designs by HUMPHREY.
1 vol. 16mo, price 40 cents.

Geo. B. Taylor's New Book.
The Oakland Stories.
VOL. I. KENNY.
Illustrated from Designs by LOMLEY.
1 vol. 16mo, price 50 cents.

Sheldon & Company, Publishers,
No. 115 Nassau Street, N. Y.

NEW MUSIC BOOK FOR SABBATH SCHOOLS.—THE GOLDEN HARP. Containing 500 Hymns, Tunes, and Chants. 35 cents single, postage free; $3 50 per dozen.
Published by OLIVER DITSON & CO., Boston.

EDWARD G. KELLEY, SUCCESSOR TO John L. Fyfe, Practical Chemist, Professor of Chemistry, Geology, and Mineralogy, Importer and manufacturer of all kinds of Chemical and Philosophical Apparatus and Pure Chemicals, 104 John Street, New York. Colleges and High Schools furnished. Catalogue, furnished free of expense.

Agents Wanted
To obtain Subscribers for
LOSSING'S
PICTORIAL FIELD-BOOK OF THE REVOLUTION.
In Two Volume Royal Octavo, containing upward of 1500 Pages and
1100 Beautiful Illustrations.
This work will be SOLD EXCLUSIVELY BY AGENTS, to each of whom a special District will be given. Rare inducements offered. Apply at once to the Columbian they would prefer. For full particulars address GEO. W. ELLIOTT, care HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

ALBERT WEBER, Piano-Forte Manufacturer, No. 180 West Broadway, near Canal St. The best assortment of PIANOS, warranted for three years, at the lowest prices. Call and examine before purchasing.

ruin SUPERIOR Strong-bodied delicate-flavored Mountain COFFEE
For sale by COUPRAL & CO
No. 2 Bowery Street.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION

VOL. III.—No. 156.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, DECEMBER 24, 1859. [PRICE FIVE CENTS.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1859, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

Our Christmas Supplement.

On Saturday, December 24, will be published a CHRISTMAS SUPPLEMENT to HARPER'S WEEKLY, being A CHRISTMAS TALE, entitled

THE HAUNTED HOUSE,

TO WIT:

The Mortals in the House,
BY CHARLES DICKENS.

The Ghost in the Clock Room,
BY MISS HESBA STRETTON.

The Ghost in the Double Room,
BY SALA.

The Ghost in the Picture Room,
BY MISS A. PROCTER.

The Ghost in the Cupboard Room,
BY WILKIE COLLINS.

The Ghost in Master B.'s Room,
BY CHARLES DICKENS.

The Ghost in the Garden Room,
BY MRS. GASKELL.

The Ghost in the Corner Room,
BY CHARLES DICKENS.

PRICE FIVE CENTS.

HESTER PRATT'S NEW-YEAR'S DAY.

NEW-YEAR'S DAY was a double anniversary to Hester Pratt. On that day, fifty years before, she had come into the world. A solitary half century it was to look back upon—for Hester was an old maid. Thirty years before she had been betrothed to Herbert Gordon, but he had proved false to his plighted faith, and the day that was to have witnessed her bridal saw him wedded to another. That day closed the heart and hardened the nature of Hester Pratt. Her manners became frosty and forbidding, and the name of old maid, which clung to her, became even more repulsive from the connection.

Within the space of three years Hester's sister and parents died, and she was left alone at thirty —alone in the house which had belonged to the family for three generations. She was advised to relieve her solitary state by admitting another family, but this she declined to do, evidently preferring solitude to society.

Twenty years passed, and in passing did not fail to leave their imprint on Hester Pratt. Her face became sharper, and her hair became more and more plentifully sprinkled with gray; yet her step was apparently as firm as ever, and her movements as decided. She had sufficient property, and more than sufficient, for her small requirements, and every year saw something added to her account in the village bank. Her savings were not likely to be diminished by charitable offerings. She had closed up the avenues to pity; and hardy must be the beggar who should ask alms of her a second time.

It was New-Year's morning—a cold, frosty morning.

On that morning Hester Pratt had baked a loaf of cake—a rich fruit cake—with which she intended to regale herself at tea. Not that she cared so much for the cake, but her mother had always been wont to do the same on that occasion, and Hester kept up the old practice.

Having baked the cake, she drew it from the oven, steaming hot as it was, and carried it out into the shed to cool.

With commendable care she shut up her solitary companion, an iron-gray cat, in the kitchen, fearing that the cake might otherwise present a temptation too strong for the cat's principles to withstand.

Meanwhile she busied herself in preparing for the oven the chicken which was to furnish forth her New-Year's dinner. This, too, was an old custom of her mother's. The chicken was nearly ready for roasting, when the sharp ears of Hester detected a slight noise in the wood-shed, which immediately adjoined the kitchen.

She advanced hastily to the door, and threw it open.

Could she believe her eyes? Could human depravity reach such an astonishing height, or rather depth? There, almost paralyzed with astonishment, she beheld a boy in the act of carrying off her favorite New-Year's cake.

Her momentary surprise over, she proceeded to act with energy.

Striding up to the delinquent, who had stopped short in consternation, she seized him by the collar of his jacket, and shook him vigorously, exclaiming, in angry tones,

"I've caught you, you little rascal—have I? Now tell me why you were going to steal my cake?"

The boy hesitated for a moment, and seemed undecided how to act.

"Tell me instantly, before I hand you over to the constable," repeated Hester, with another shake, while with her free hand she snatched from the boy the cake which he had appropriated.

"I was very hungry," said he, in a low voice.

"Hungry! I dare say," sneered Hester. "I guess if this had been a loaf of bread instead of cake you wouldn't have been troubled in that way."

"I would rather have bread," said the boy.

"You would!" exclaimed Hester, astonished.

"Besides, I wanted to carry it to little Bessie."

"Who is little Bessie?" inquired Hester, with something of curiosity in her manner.

"She is my sister, and she is blind."

Hester looked attentively at the boy. In spite of her hardness, there was something in this allusion which touched her.

The boy was apparently about eleven years of age. He was a handsome boy, or would have been, if his pinched face had not spoken to eloquently of privation. His clothing was quite insufficient for that inclement day, and his hands were fairly red with the cold. New Hester's projudices were all against him. Her theory in regard to boys was that they were unmitigated nuisances—that they were a class of young vagabonds who took a malicious pleasure in lying, thieving, and kindred vices—and she had hitherto waged an uncompromising warfare against them.

Yet there was an indefinable something about this boy—something in his expression—which softened her against her will. Scarcely knowing how to proceed, she began to question him.

"Do you live in this village?" I never saw you before."

"I never was here before this morning, ma'am."

"You don't find it convenient to stop long in the same place," said Hester, sarcastically, thinking of her cake.

Apparently the boy understood the allusion; for he said, earnestly:

"Indeed, ma'am, I wouldn't have taken the cake if we hadn't been so hungry, Bessie and I."

"Bessie? You've spoken of her before. How do I know but it's a story you are making up, just to get off?" said Hester, hardening herself.

"I would show her to you, ma'am, if—if—"

"If what?" interrupted Hester, sharply.

"I was thinking you wouldn't want to go where she is, and you might think if I offered to bring her that I was only trying to get away."

"He's sharper than I thought for," passed through Hester's mind. "And where is your sister?" she asked, aloud.

"I left her in the barn over there," said the boy, pointing across the fields.

"Is she older than you?" asked Hester.

"No, she is two years younger," was the reply.

"You might be in better business than trespassing about the country stealing cake," said Hester Pratt, in an uncompromising tone. "Why don't you stay at home with your parents?"

"They are both dead," said the boy, sadly.

"Dead!" exclaimed Hester, half-sympathetically. She remembered her own grief when her father and mother had died, and left her alone in the world.

"Yes, ma'am. They died six months ago."

"Where?"

"In the city."

THE BLIND GIRL AT HESTER PRATT'S TABLE.

"And why didn't you go to some of your uncles or aunts?"

"We had none."

"What! had no relations of any kind?"

"None very near."

"And so you've been obliged to support the country ever since, have you?"

"Yes, ma'am."

"Getting your living by stealing, I suppose?"

"No, ma'am," said the boy, blushing.

"How, then?"

"Sometimes people would be kind enough to give us a little something, and we didn't need much. But this morning I have been to two or three places, and they told me they didn't believe my story, and so, as I came through your yard, I happened to see the cake on the shed, and I thought of how hungry Bessie was, and I didn't dare to ask, for they might refuse, and so—"

"So you stole it?"

"Yes," said the boy, in confusion.

"What was Bessie to do?"

She more than half believed the boy's story, and yet her distrust of human nature would not down.

She must have ocular proof of his truth and then—well, then she would decide what to do.

Sit down in that chair," said she, "and I will get my things, and go over to the barn with you, and see if your story is correct."

"Will you?" exclaimed the boy, joyfully.

"He doesn't seem to be afraid for the result," thought Hester.

In two minutes she was ready to go.

They took their way across the field. There was no path, but the upper surface of the snow was frozen stiff, so that there was no danger of falling through. Hester put on boots of the boy's size, with the lurking suspicion that he might yet climb her in some way.

So they reached the barn.

It was in the mid-dle of a large field, and, contrary to the usual custom in the country, at quite a distance from any house.

The boy went to the door and called, "Bessie!"

"Where are you, brother?" said a sweet, childish voice.

He went into the barn, and led out a beautiful little girl of nine, with a sweet expression, but even, alas! Hester closed to the bright sunshine and the fair world.

"Have you brought any bread?" asked the little girl, "I am so hungry."

"No, Bessie," said the boy; but he quickly added, "I have brought a lady who was kind enough to come with me to see you."

"Where is she?" asked Bessie, stretching out her hand.

And Hester Pratt, more moved than she had been for many years, put forth her own hand to meet the hand of little Bessie, and she said, more kindly than was her wont, "I am sorry you are so hungry, child, but you will come to my house, you and your brother shall have something to eat."

"Let us go at once, then," said the boy.

"We are much obliged to you," said the boy, grateful for a kindness which Hester Pratt's previous manner had led her to think impossible.

They were soon at the house, and Hester brought forth a generous supply of bread and butter, together with an apple-pie. It need hardly be said that the children did ample justice to what was set before them.

"Didn't your sister tell you Herbert?" asked Hester almost gently, after they had quietly satisfied their appetite. "What is your last name?"

"Gordon. My name is Herbert Gordon."

"And your father's name?" asked Hester, hoarsely.

"I was named after him."

Hester rose, and paced the floor excitedly.

These, then, were the children of her faithless lover—and him who had embittered her life, and yet she could not dislike them. Strangely enough she felt a yearning for them, as if she would like to have them live with her always. There was a fierce struggle in her heart, but the fresh, generous impulses that had so long been stifled, arose then, and when the children rose, and thanking her for their lunch, offered to go, she said, shortly,

"Would you like to live with me always?"

A flush of joy overspread the faces of the two orphans, and they accepted her offer with grateful thanks.

And that was the happiest New-Year's day that Hester Pratt had ever passed.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 24, 1859.

OUR FOURTH VOLUME

The First Number of the Fourth Volume of HARPER'S WEEKLY will appear on the 4th January, 1860. This year over 400,000 Numbers of HARPER'S WEEKLY will have been sold, nearly half of which will be issued for subscribers. In announcing the new volume, the proprietors desire to state that it has been their aim to render it worthy of the year, in the first place, and before any thing else, a reliable and comprehensive pictorial history of current events, equal to the daily press in fullness of description, and superior to the daily press as combining illustrations with text. Here for they have established what they trust the volumes now published will show. The illustrations in the Third Volume will bear comparison with those in any which every important event of the past year has been related and illustrated in the pages of HARPER'S WEEKLY. They would refer especially, in this connection, to The Italian War, the Great Eastern Steamship, the Harper's Ferry Outbreak, the Utah Expedition, the Paraguay Expedition, China, etc., etc. The value of the paper can be best realized by supposing that it did not exist, and by trying to conceive how little people would really know of passing events if they had to rely on written descriptions alone. In this respect, the arrangements for the coming year are more complete than they have been heretofore. HARPER'S WEEKLY has regular artist correspondents in almost every quarter of the globe, and commands the result of the first artists in the world. It is moreover, in order to present its readers with a complete illustrated history of our age, determined to include in its pages the best and most generally interesting pictures from foreign illustrated journals. In a word, the subscriber to HARPER'S WEEKLY may depend on finding in its pages next year as accurate, well-drawn, well-engraved, and well-printed pictures of every memorable event which occurs, and a portrait of every man who attracts the general attention of the people of this country.

HARPER'S WEEKLY will continue, as heretofore, to publish the best tales that are written by skilful and fashionable writers. Among the stories now in hand for CIVIL CODE, by CHARLES DICKENS (with original illustrations by the author); WHAT WILL HE DO WITH IT? a novel by Sir E. LYTTON BULWER; The Dead Secret, by WILKIE COLLINS; Lots to the Witch, by MRS. GASKELL; A Good Fight, by JOHN HALIFAX; Heart is not Everything, by CHARLES THOMAS, by GEORGE WILLIAM CURTIS; and The Romance of War, by LOSSING and COLLIER. Or, to indicate the conclusion of these tales, others of equal merit will be commenced, it being the intention of the publishers to secure for every week of publication the best tales to be had here or abroad. It is hardly necessary to add, that the foreign serials which appear in HARPER'S WEEKLY are purchased from their authors by the proprietors of HARPER'S WEEKLY, who, to make assurance doubly sure, give the mere right of publication which amounts to a handsome copyright in the publication.

In addition to serials, each number of HARPER'S WEEKLY will contain a short complete tale by a native or foreign author. As a guide to the character of these stories, the publishers will publish the last that they can obtain, without regarding their origin.

The other departments of HARPER'S WEEKLY will continue to receive careful attention at the hands of the publishers.

TERMS OF HARPER'S WEEKLY.

One Copy for Twenty Weeks	$1 00
One Copy for One Year	2 50
One Copy for Six Months	1 00
Five Copies for One Year	9 00
Twelve Copies for One Year	20 00
Twenty-five Copies for One Year	40 00

An Extra Copy will be allowed for every Club of TWENTY OR TWENTY-FIVE SUBSCRIBERS.

TERMS FOR ADVERTISING IN HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A Liberal Discount will be made to those wishing to Advertise for three Months or more.

* * Twenty-five cents must be added if New York wishing to "Harper's Weekly" left at their houses, will please send a Post-office order payable to their names. Address, postpaid, to the Office of Publication,

HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers,
Franklin Square, New York.

THE TRADE OF THE UNITED STATES FOR 1858–'59.

MR. SECRETARY COBB has permitted the Washington Constitution to publish advance returns of the imports and exports of the United States for the year 1858–'59—the last fiscal year, ending 30th June last. The tables from which these returns are taken, we should have not yet been made public. They show, in brief, that, during the twelve months ending with June last, the foreign imports into this country merchandise amounted to $338,000,000, showing a balance in favor of the country amounting to about $14,000,000.

The Washington Constitution, a party paper, used these returns for a party political purpose in aid of the Southern theory that "cotton is king," and therefore the great source of the country's wealth. Having discovered that the bulk of the exports of domestic produce were of Southern growth—cotton, rice, naval stores, and tobacco, etc.—the official newspaper drew a fallacious parallel between the products of the two sections, which the Southern Democracy accept in the support of the Northern. To do this, it willfully omitted from its comparison the exports of produce amounting to $37,000,000 of the produce of a free State; and it concealed the fact that, in consequence of the poor harvest of breadstuffs in the United Kingdom, and of the bountiful harvests of foreign countries, there was little or no export of wheat or flour to Europe. In the full text of the report we review. The argument of the official editor, moreover, showed his entire unconsciousness of the fact that, notwithstanding the large gross of the exports in the South, the Southern demand for foreign commodities still keeps the balance of trade between North and South. They show, in short, that cotton, tobacco, rice, etc., the products of the South, cottons, tools, steam-engines, and the like; are exchanged for the other. The argument of the official editor, moreover, showed his entire unconsciousness of the fact that, notwithstanding the large gross of the exports in the South, the Southern demand for foreign commodities still keeps the balance of trade between North and South. They show, in short, that cotton, tobacco, rice, etc., the products of the South, immediate payment is made. No credit is given, no grace granted. If at any time the Southern planter or factor finds from the North goods equivalent in value to his export of produce, Southern exchange on the North would fall, and specie would flow Southward until every Northern bank were broken.

The fact is, this commercial quarrel between North and South is the old dispute between the belly and the members over again. The South, like the belly in the fable, declares that its action is the sustenance of the body politic; and the North, like the arms and legs in the fable, swears that without its dry goods and tools the South could not grow any thing. It is a childish, unphilosophical worthy of miserable party political organs.

The growth and export of cotton are indeed subjects worthy of profound reflection. We exported last fiscal year $161,434,000 of the staple. This fiscal year—1859–'60—our export of cotton will probably exceed $180,000,000. The crop is larger, the price high. Half a century since we did not export $1,000,000 worth of cotton in a single year. We did not attempt our export we could not have imported foreign goods as we have done, and there could have been no great demand for foreign trade in the city of New York. If, now, from civil war, or a servile insurrection, or unfavorable weather, the cotton crop should fall short, or the export of cotton were to cease, our imports of foreign goods would decline in proportion, and grass would grow in the streets of New York and other sea-ports. This is the consummation to which we are hastening under the protectionist theories now in vogue. They object to free commerce, and, forgetful of the immutable principle that progress increases in the division and subdivision of employments, would have us produce our independence of foreign countries by manufacturing every thing we need, and dispensing with foreign trade. Whether the country at large would be a gainer by the ruin of the South, of New York, Boston, of Philadelphia, of Baltimore, etc., etc., etc., our readers can decide for themselves. An enlightened public will probably think that the more extensive our interchange of commodities with the world, the more active our life will be, and, consequently, the more wholesome.

Our export of breadstuffs during the fiscal year 1858–'59 was small. We have reviewed the subject in previous numbers, and can see, and shown the causes of the phenomenon. This year (i. e., 1859–'60) our export of breadstuffs will be large. We are now shipping every week from this port alone some 150,000 or 200,000 bushels of wheat (in wheat and flour). The shipments for the next spring will be very large; so also will be the shipments of provisions. With regard to wheat it is still doubtful whether, in the end, it can be classed among the staple exports of the United States. It is very doubtful whether, even with the best of harvests, the United States grow much more wheat than they require for their own consumption. It is certain that even a moderate export demand—leading to shipments of 20,000,000 or 25,000,000 bushels of wheat, in the twelvemonth, to Great Britain—causes an advance in the price from which it imposes a heavy tax on consumers. Every dollar taken from England for wheat costs wheat consumers here from $2 to $3.

We look, in the future—presuming that no political catastrophe occurs—to increased shipments of cotton, and to a steady and rather diminished shipments of wheat. Our miscellaneous exports, including manufactures, are sure to increase, as the wealth and prosperity accumulate; it is doubtful whether we shall have any flour to spare. The staple exports which an enlightened political economy will teach us to cultivate are gold, silver, and cotton. The more of these we send abroad, the more active our trade will be, and the richer the country will grow: foreign stuffs we need at home. No country is really enormous does not grow food enough to supply its people's supply: we can not do this and feed Europe as well.

THE COLLAPSE OF THE HOOPS.

At last, after ever so many false alarms, it is certain that hoops are going out. The manufacturers are coming to disappear from the pages. The jobbers who were prudent and careful, and who consequently had always a large stock of hoops on hand, find contrasts to some more by the hundreds of dozens, are in despair at the catastrophe which threatens to leave them with an enormous dead stock on their shelves. A lady, young, beautiful, and distingué, was seen to walk up Broadway last week without hoops. Her appearance caused the men from mere surprise, but the Indies from envy. For the fiat has gone forth from Compiegne that hoops shall no longer be worn.

Not unto us doth it belong to decide what shall replace the famous structures. What sun broad—was not the nurse of the Nile; and hearing from the natives of another lake, which they called simply Nyanza, or the Lake, it was resolved to push on. The Arab traders who go to the shores of this lake to deal with the natives in ivory, hear from them that on the northeasterly parts there are large craft, holding forty or fifty men; that there are several large rivers connected with it, one of which, at least, probably does run to the sea; and that a river which the natives called Bari living upon one of these rivers, and the tribe Bari has been visited by Knoblecher, Werne, and other explorers. Mr. Baker has ascertained the source of the Nile where Captain Speke has calculated the Nyanza's southern extremity, in the second degree of south latitude.

On the 9th of July Captain Speke started with six weeks' supply, after a very uncomfortable journey, on the 3d of August they saw the blue line of the Nyanza. Canoes had been procured, and the stock of beads and cloth was so low, that Speke could remain for three days only. This seems hardly explicable. That an expedition which was evidently so near settling that the source was not in the Lake could not have something more—should stay upon its shores only three days, is melancholy. With such profusion of provision as they had at Unyanyembe, they were surely midst have taken at least three months' supply. It is with the more tantalizing idea of a river observed by Captain Speke confessed his theory.

It can not be very long before the great question is decided, if it be only by a two months' visit from the sea-coast to the Lake: and the English Royal Geographical Society, which authorized the expedition, will hardly suffer the Lake to remain unexplored.

REPORTING.

"DEAR LONGUS,—I wish to ask, respectfully, if you have ever been the unhappy subject of a report.' Did you ever make a speech, or deliver an oration, or address, or lecture, which was reported? and did it seem to your eyes how you felt when you saw it; and what you think of the whole business.

"Yours, CICERO JONES."

The Lounger presents his compliments to Mr. Cicero Jones, and begs to reply that he has been such a subject, and that he felt as a man does who sees his face reflected upon the surface of a severe looking-glass. The criticisms were, perhaps, unfortunate bodkins his face utterly dislocated and distorted, and doubtless to think that some admirer of his must see only a glimpse of his face.

A phonographic report is now so skillfully done that a speaker finds his very words, sentences, and all, as accurately reproduced as the crow's-foot around his eyes by a faithful mirror. But a reporter, an abstract, a newspaper's idea of a speaker, is meant to say, or even did say, is a very different thing. It is not to report a man's words correctly, to give an illustration as an argument, or to miss entirely the purport of a sarcasm or a witticism. An clergyman was lecturing in Philadelphia, and in the warmth and height of his oration shouted, "And God will say thunder shall smite them," and several listeners rose and left the hall with an air of horror. The speaker, upon inquiry, learned that he had been misreported to say, "And God said, by thunder," etc.

In the same way the reporter is very apt to hear upon a theory. He presupposes that the speaker is going to say certain things, and if any thing is said somewhere from down to pay in print as said. It is amusing to reflect how many speakers in this country suffer in general reputation for saying what they never said or thought of saying. Mr. Everett avoids this nuisance by always carefully furnishing either a copy of his speech, or an abstract prepared by himself. A listener can only make an abstract after a very careful hearing and assimilation of the whole discourse. This is a task to which few reporters care to address themselves. They pick out the plums. They remember where the laugh comes in; and they serve up to their readers the fruit and cause, but no pudding.

Lately a Lyceum lecturer was speaking at length of lawyers: the dangers and temptations of the profession, and its current, social estimation. Among other things he said that a wise lawyer bit his tongue and spoke only when a word would tell, however much he might be driven: that, in fact, like Talleyrand, he was a shrewd listener. Next day upon a newspaper, which did not approve of the general sentiments of the speaker, and the next morning that "the Honorable Cicero Jones (for instance) delivered a lecture last evening in which he said that lawyers were like Talleyrand."

However, the Honorable Cicero need not be troubled. How many people read the report of a speech in the quotation. The very serious difficulty is when a full phonographic report is made, and the lecture is to be immediately transferred to the columns. If it be the lecture of a man who usually has something to say, it will be read, and the reader, having had the whole, will feel differently about hearing it again from one who has been only stimulated by the good things he said.

Undoubtedly the more comfortable and convenient plan, both for the speaker and the paper, is to do what Mr. Everett does, and prepare an abstract. How the reporters would thank him!

STYLE.

Since the death of Irving, his exquisite style has been the theme of constant praise. One critic calls it as perfect as Addison's, and every body who is familiar with Irving's writings knows their singular charm of style. The old proverb that the style is the man, is true enough, because, strictly speaking, every outward manifestation of the man is his style. A man's manner, conduct, way of speaking, and moving, are all his style. If he be plain, simple, they are so. If he is affected or pompous, they are so also. But sincerity is not always plainness. A man exquisitely dressed may be quite as simple as George Fox in his leather suit. So in literature there is no special style which can be selected as the only good one, or the only simple one. Every style which justly illustrates the author's mind is a good and natural style, although it may be gorgeously decorated. The Gothic architecture is as natural as the Greek although so much more elaborate. Addison's is not an ideal English style, but it is a very fine and natural style in which every man ought to try to write. Did Dr Johnson has a famous passage in which he advised a lady who wished to write good English to give his days and nights to Addison. How fond the Doctor was of his long words, this may be seen clearly enough in the fact that his own style is, in every particular, the reverse of Addison's. It is more ambitious, more sonorous, and Latinized.

Addison was a man of a great sense of propriety rather than of great genius. An accomplished scholar, a brilliant talker, a man of affairs, and of the world, genteel, he had a sound, healthy, though full, humorous temperament, and to that the delicate fancies of Irving were wholly alien. Irving had a bent, or he lingered, pensive, among the monuments of Westminster, and maintained a cheerful, but not exuberant, spirit. In the midst of life and literature, at a time when decency was out of fashion.

Addison's style is eminently the man. It is the simplicity of perfect good breeding and freedom from affectation. But Addison was not outwardly, by reason of it, a sweeter and more humane. It is the simplicity, and not the humanity, that is felt in Addison. The Irishman is glowingly graceful and limpid. The Englishman is clear also, and graceful, but is dull.

It is a dangerous mistake, therefore, to commend style for its simplicity alone. Swift was a person Charles Lamb, or John Ruskin, or Thomas Carlyle has tried to write like Addison. Suppose, in German, Jean Paul should attempt the clear style of Lessing. Irving's style is exquisite because it is his own. He has caught the charms of Goldsmith and Addison; having the taste and propriety of the one, with the genial tenderness of the other. He very likely has his garden have any excellence as an author he owes it to Washington. His first essays show that he was early loved to the indolences of the best English belle-lettre spirit. The Salmagundi is a study in that style. But the more original Knickerbocker History—

Assuredly, however, his style is no finer than Hawthorne's or Emerson's. The lily and the violet are lovely flowers, but they are not the garden pet violets and lilies? The tree often of a writer is his style. His first essays show that he was studious, but to say what he has to say in the manner which is most characteristic—or, in other words, in the manner which is most natural to him—is very well fancy Mr. Everett speaking like Mr. Webster, or Mr. Webster like Mr. Everett. Close study, reflection, criticism, will help in style as they do in every expression. But to follow any model is to sing a song which is another's. Conscious imitation is always unnatural.

One point of style must be remembered. All that is implied here is this—that genuine literary talent forms its characteristic expression, which is the quality of style, in the mind of the listener—all that is another thing. Try to write as simply as you can—you will not write like Addison—a most incisive manner. But remember that Milton, Addison, Johnson, Goldsmith, Jeremy Taylor, Defoe, Swift, Irving, Hallam, Macaulay, Carlyle, Webster, and Irving, all did the same thing, and the result is as different as the men.

THE NIGHT-WATCH.

THEY sit beside her bed—
The patient watchers for her—
Or move, with noiseless tread,
To hush the sighs that stir her failing tears.

While her hot brow is fanned
By the poor mother through the livelong night,
The father, with his hand,
Shades from her sensitive eyes the cruel light.

The bracelet and the pin
Are thrown aside, which once she proudly wore;
The ring, which made her kin
Have slipped the rings that shall be worn no more.

Death soon will change the scene:
A little while, and weeping over a mound
Of slowly-deepening green,
The stricken watchers will again be found.

WASHINGTON CITY.

THE LOUNGER'S LETTER-BOX.

—P. D. All manuscripts sent to the Publishers are carefully considered.

—Several correspondents reply to "A. Photo" that he will find the lines in Young's Night Thoughts, Night I.:

"Tir'd Nature's sweet restorer, balmy Sleep!
He, like the world, his ready visit pays
Where fortune smiles: the wretched he forsakes:
Swift on his downy pinions flies from woe,
And lights on kids unsullied with a tear."

—The Cicero Jones report is politely informed that the address of Mrs. or Miriam was also used in this country, and is now in Boston, at the rooms of elderly unmarried women. Mrs. Hannah More and Mrs. Joanna Baillie are similar titles.

—J. C. H. There is but one kind of allanthus-tree common in this country. Both the male and female grow in New York. The seed pods are on the female tree. They are of a reddish hue. The male blossoms shrink, Downing praised the tree for its rapid growth, but it has fallen out of favor now from its suckering and the offensive odor of the flowers. Mr. Barnum, the editor of Downing's Landscape Gardening, who brings rural art down to the very doors of the Peninsula, also a Japan tree, as a substitute for the allanthus.

—"MY FALSE FRIEND" is respectfully declined.

HUMORS OF THE DAY.

We have received the following letter, which we print verbatim et literatim:

M——— georgia
the 5o november 1859

Mister harper
dear sir

I see from The rumpus That thar has bin a considerble fuss Gone on in your parry I read he adiges of you would give no ad The correspondance conected with the Dishonest men you cast get out your engagements and newspaper regular as you is accustomed to get it out plain and Distinct and you will Do well

I forget to say that I payed you in advanse please to send me a receit for the same and your Dye is due in March can Get across it if I want so as I understand ther is a Duke Due to our section we has Dun Sent our Dellegates to and niggers to pull them across the river so far I am a Democrat and will be as long as I am a citizen of a Sovereign State I am yours respectfully

MR. PUBBS is an extraordinarily facetious man; so much so in Pubbs that he doesn't even take his oysters pro-miscuously without a joke. "For d'ye see, my boy," says Pubbs, "there's an astonishing no these promiscuous people, that I can't abide to manufacture a joke." With this eloquent sentiment, Pubbs goes to Delmonico's. "Hold on, Delmonico," says Pubbs, "I'll have a few oysters, if you please—no, not a corpulent Dutchman sized beside him, successfully surveying a single square on the plate before him. "No more round than Dutchmen!" kills first, the expression of the Dutchman's face changed from pleasure to pain.

"Ah! uncle Sam, you schneller him white? Better says Hamilton.

"Of course," says Pubbs.

"And you, Delmonico blue him whole, too," pitiously with his fork to the lone oyster that lay on the plate before him.

"Certainly I can," says Pubbs, and, suiting the action to the word, he squeezed the one on to his fork, and it was gone in a twinkling.

"Uncle Sam Gott, dat is wonderful, wonderful! I be one big fool, I be one big fool, I be one, two, three—every time I spit him Jack."

Pubbs sat down, and—swore—once more.

A very Northern trader sold a an amusing story of Bill Williams, who got the money he spends for whiskey by every other way he can and there is no fun that Lither Green united him out day, and Bill, coming just from a spree, was sitting on a log, when Green, who was passing, stopped and asked him what he was doing. He answered as the very moment when the oddity with his face struck him, and the unsuspicious dame to his question. "Me ither pretended to ask a blessing, which Bill thought was mocking his kith and kin, and he replied sarcastically for the desire, when he called out to the rider, "Say, Green, you d——d fool!"

"What do you want, Mr. Williams?"

"Why, I want to know if you have a little slightly running over you."

Among the remarkable religious papers—the Christian Advocate—states, as fact, that a preacher of considerable promise, in Tennessee, was a teacher for years past, had occasion, in a sermon, to allude to the sinking of Christ, and, using the language of Julius to Brutus, he began by telling them that "There was a little girl in the congregation, who, at the time, was sick at the house of Count. The little girl died, and she must have been carried to see if he could not relate to her the dead. Jesus came and putting them all out of the room, he took the little girl by the hand and said, 'Talitha cumi,' and little Talitha got up and ate supper with them."

Such, the other day, while looking at the skeleton of a donkey, and admiring and wondering at the structure of the animal's mouth, made a very intelligent observation. "Ah!" said he, "no ass fearfully and wonderful."

ACCIDENT IN THE TOO.—In the terrible fog of last week, Horace Greeley, was blown down in Broadway by a heavy gust of wind. As soon as possible, an equally bewildered pedestrian, coming up, observed, "Now then, move on, Horace."

Brebbs, a celebrated juggler, being at Canterbury fair, was desired by a countryman to perform a trick very almost starved. He repaired to the churchwardens, and requested the loan of a hat of a little consequence. "Sir, your if the parish would pay for bringing it up to you. The churchwardens refused to lend the hat, and Brebbs, not securing the churchwardens valet upon the wicked hat, he exclaimed:

"I should laugh to see him!" said Dreblan: "de pedlis were for de poor. I took apot my pennies, and given to some poor, who are de poorest in de parish."

"Well!" exclaimed the churchwardens, "this is a trick!"

"I know it," replied the conjurer. "I live by my tricks."

A missionary in New Zealand was lost in the bush. There was not much in sight of him but a heap of savages, of whom they were very fond. He was even then devoted to slavery. "If I had found him," replied one of them, "I should have eaten him!"

A FAMILY SECRET.—We never knew a family that had not a Cousin in it.

PROS AND CONS FOR POTE PUS.

The Pope has a baker in Rome.
He has the Church for child and wife,
With Italian, Gaul, and Austria, for friend,
And eke Infallibility.

With Antonelli's counsels sage,
Wyseman and Bowyer's settled page,
About near write what cards he will,
And the Immaculate Trick he'll play.

Let Garibaldi rouse to arms,
A cadet's voice the trumpet charms:
If to give false Napoleon duty,
The Swiss Volunteers the Colours.

But yet he's not a happy man,
With Grammont at the Vatican,
In Peter's room "no room" he sees,
With pointed bayonets prugging it.

Morton meetings break his rest,
Starbuckers have a bit to pick the breast;
Arcetis and Frazee, it is said,
Both send him with swords and guns.

Between two stools, as all folks know,
Into the ground he comes below.
Much more his Holiness of Rome
Between some stools is glad must come.

Peeps of France his conduct school:
A rebel people quiet he rule;
As fervent, pious, and as true
The Saunders of the Vatican.

When sometimes contentious Rome
And sensitive Senior guards turn tail;
When naked Truth does face the day,
Splendors and figments thrown away—

When Austria hides her damaged land,
And Bombastes shrinks to bed;
When Pio Nono's text defense
Is Vaudlin's truth and Calista's sense—

Oh! Hollow Mock, that silent there,
In Peter's empty bed my chair,
Bleeder of my country's wrongs,
I would not that thy seat were mine.

EMPLOYMENT FOR WOMEN.—To teach the men to behave better to them. Our only fear is that the employment will be found too difficult for them, and that after all they would not quite reach it.

A runaway thief having applied to a blacksmith for work, the latter showed him some handcuffs, and asked him if he understood such kind of work.

"Why, yes, Sir," said the other, "I guess I've had a hand in 'em often."

One Sunday lately a shoemaker was arrested for repairing shoes on a holiday. He was taken to the station-house, locked up, discharged, and summoned to appear before the second police justice. "Friend thou lookest better in mending leather than in making such excuses as these."

An Irish tramp called for relief at St. Peter's Hospital, Bristol, and complained of being ill, when the doctor gave him an ounce for some medicine. When he presented the order and heard what it provided, Pat said he was "very ill, but he was sure he could be ill to the tune of a pound." The doctor wished him the joke, and knew better than the patient. "Then," said Pat, "take it all, sir, and welcome."

THE MORTARA STORY AND MORAL.

A Jew boy comes home rather grimy and greasy,
Has been playing in social spirits with the Devil,
"He's a Christian," cries Pius, with conscience uneasy,
Grieved,
Cries Pius, back, "But if making a Christian's so easy,
Why don't you convert your wife, the Pope?"

A friend of ours has a little son who is considered by the knowing ones as quite a "debater."

A few days since his mother observed that he visited a particular corner in the garden quite often, and watched him. Curiosity led her to steal down one morning, when she saw him considering a feather he had pulled out of his cap-feather. He looked at it very attentively, and then at a little bird which he had recently killed, within the contiguous yard.

"Now, I guess you'll go to ride chickens as well as any body." At this point the laugh came in, and the mother's curiosity was satisfied.

The Fredonia Debating Society were considering the propriety of purchasing a hotel bar; and it was used as an argument in favor of the measure that the hotel was engrossed a wish that, when he died, he might be laid in the bar. The bill was lost by a single vote.

Down in Kentucky a dog-fight was got up, and it was asked of one who was inclined to the purchase.

"Will it fight?" "Will it fight? Why, he be pyrebowed: but the man who agreed to be buried in it has backed out."

LOVE POEM.

He struggled to kiss her. She struggled the same
Till both were as red and embarrassed as flame;
But, as smiles by lightning, he heard her exclaim,
"Oh, you're such a bad, wicked, naughty man!"

But when he returned with the fandishest laugh,
Showing clearly that he was ashamed,
She cried "Don't!" and the poor fellow left off.

He was a man of a very old-fogy sort, and it was asked of one who was indicted to the purchase.

"Will it sell?" "Will it sell? Why, it will be prosecuted: but the man who agreed to be buried in it has backed out."

LOVE POEM.

He struggled to kiss her. She struggled the same
Till both were as red and embarrassed as flame;
But, as smiles by lightning, he heard her exclaim,
"Oh, you're such a bad, wicked, naughty man!"

But when he returned with the fandishest laugh,
Showing clearly that he was ashamed,
She cried "Don't!" and the poor fellow left off.

At one of the resorts held in Bucks County, and which was presided over by the late Judge Busks, Mr. Thorn was led with the following bit of poetics. "Mr. Thorn is a considerable ability, but rather diffident."

The Judge was fond of the use of the word, and would say, "Mr. Thorn, you have a very diffident air," or "a very diffident manner."

At one of the resorts held in Bucks County, and which was presided over by the late Judge Busks, Mr. Thorn was led with the following bit of poetics. "Mr. Thorn is a considerable ability, but rather diffident."

The Judge was fond of the use of the word, and would say, "Mr. Thorn, you have a very diffident air," or "a very diffident manner."

"May it please the Court, there's a man in jail that wants to get out."

"Then let him get out," said the Judge, in a fit of pique.

"There's a many another man like him; and he'd be a fool if he didn't get out."

It was some time before Mr. T. recovered his self-possession, and then he was properly sworn.

A correspondent of the Columbus (South Carolina) Times gives the following exclusively illustration of the peculiarities of the Irish: "A wedding took place by the name of Conkey, having been solemnized by the holy bonds of matrimony, the usual congratulations were passed, and even compositions, to the printer for publication.

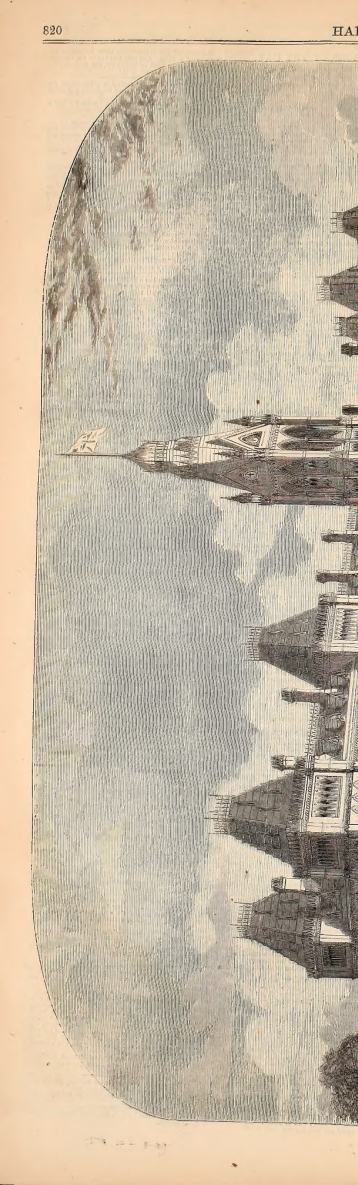
"Married—At Graham, Feb. 19, A. Conkey, Esq., Attorney at Law, to Miss Angelina Wiggins.

"Married—At the same time and place
That beat in subtlety,
Timothy Conkey with its rosebuds
No bitter fellow to be Conkey."

He looked with much anxiety for the next issue of the Gresham Sentinel, to order to see his name in print. The paper came out, and there was the notice, but the printer happened to be on a spree at the time, and made a wonderful blunder. The notice appeared in the following manner:

"Married—At Graham, Feb. 19, A. Donkey, Esq., Attorney at Law, to Miss Angelina Wiggins.

"June is an union of two heads
That both is soft wood,
Timothy Donkey with its rosebuds
No bitter fellow to be don



THE PROPOSED NEW PARLIAMENT BUILDINGS AT OTTAWA CITY, CANADA.

THE NEW PARLIAMENT BUILDINGS AT OTTAWA, CANADA.

We engrave on this page a picture of the new Parliament Buildings which are about to be erected at the City of Ottawa, Canada West. The architects are Messrs. Fuller & Jones of Toronto. The Leader of that city thus describes the design:

"The style of the Parliament buildings is akin to the Southern or Italian Gothic, or more properly, it is the Gothic adopted to this climate. They are required to be constructed for a sum not exceeding £75,000; and the successful architects are confident that their plan can be carried out for that sum. These buildings will be about 500 feet long, and of irregular width; the centre of the series towers will be 180 feet high, and the body of the building in front about 40 feet, with standing roofs. The Legislative Halls are placed on each side of the central court—which is about 100 feet by 70, so that it will afford ample light and air—from which they are separated by corridors. They are on the ground-floor; and in capacity are each equal to the English House of Lords: 95 feet by 45. The plan adopted is the only one in which the Legislative Halls are placed on the ground-floor, an advantage so manifest that we may be sure it would not have been overlooked in deciding upon the plans. There are no rooms above the Legislative Halls; and from the plan of lighting which is to be adopted there could have been none. The panelled roof admits light during the day, which is in addition to that supplied by the side windows; and at night the artificial light will also descend from above. The light thus given will be of that peculiar soft kind which will render the change from day to night almost imperceptible. This is no doubtful experiment; for this plan of lighting is adopted from that actually in use in the British House of Commons. No gas will be required in the body of the Chambers. The mode of lighting is another advantage peculiar to the plans adopted. The galleries for the accommodation of the public, which are of ample dimensions, do not protrude into the Chambers at all, but are situated over the corridor. This arrangement is in a very convenient one, but it was not peculiar to that or the plans adopted, as it was to be found in one of the others. But taking the three things together—the fact that the Legislative Halls are placed on the ground-floor, the mode of lighting from the roof, and the placing of the galleries over the corridors—form an assemblage of convenient arrangements not to be found in any of the other plans. The Reporters' gallery is placed behind the Speaker's chair, and may be of any required dimensions. A separate entrance is provided for the Reporters, as for the Governor-General; and an apartment is provided for them in which to write out their notes. The library building is of circular shape, and situated in the rear of the main building, from which it is partially detached, as much as it can be said to be when connected by one story instead of two. It is on the plan of the new library of the British Museum, and is fire-proof. It will be capable of holding some 200,000 volumes.

"Between the Legislative Halls and the central court there is a corridor, a noiseless lobby at the end, and another corridor on the other side. Beyond this, and parallel with the Legislative Halls, are wardrobes, watercloseta, etc. The reading-rooms are at the back-end of the Legislative Halls; and the Speaker's rooms at the outer corners of the square that encloses the two chambers and the central court. Speaker's and Librarian's residences are attached; but they form no necessary part of the building; and indeed we believe were put in by the architects without express orders, as that they may or may not be constructed along with the other buildings. There is a small court in the centre of each wing; the rooms around which will serve for committees, clerks, and other needful purposes. At the further end of the central court is a room for His Excellency the Governor-General. The post-offices are placed near the main entrance, over which rises the central tower, and under which carriages may be driven. The members' entrance is on a direct line with the outer corridors, between the Legislative Halls; or rather on extension of these corridors to the front. The entrances to the offices and committee-rooms are in the centre of the wings in front of the building; so that there will be no unnecessary contact of different classes of persons, which business will require them to obtain access to the Legislative buildings. The smoking-rooms are in the back part of the buildings, in the one-storied part that lends from the main building to the library.

"The disposition of space on the second story is precisely the same as in the first, though, as already remarked, that portion of the building which forms Legislative Halls, and that which forms the connecting link of the main building with the library, are only one story high. The arrangements for heating and ventilating are deemed to be ample.

"It is intended to place the buildings on the bank of the river, which is some 150 feet high, and from which they will present an imposing appearance. At the rear of the buildings—which will run parallel with the river —the elevated library, rising 50 feet above the surface, will present a conspicuous figure. The front, with its seven towers, the central one rising to an altitude of 220 feet, will expose one of the handsomest buildings in America."

THE WOMAN in WHITE.

By WILKIE COLLINS.

[AUTHOR OF "THE DEAD SECRET," "AFTER DARK," ETC., ETC.

(Printed from advance proof-sheets purchased from the author exclusively for "Harper's Weekly.")

HARTRIGHT'S NARRATIVE—Continued.

X.

Not a word more was said, on either side, as we walked back to the house. Miss Halcombe hastened immediately to her sister's room, and I withdrew to my studio to set in order all of Mr. Fairlie's drawings that I had not yet mounted and restored before I resigned them to the care of other hands. Thoughts that I had hitherto restrained, thoughts that made my position harder than ever to endure, crowded on me now that I was alone.

She was engaged to be married; and her future husband was Sir Percival Glyde. A man of the rank of baronet, and the owner of property in Hampshire.

There were hundreds of baronets in England, and dozens of land-owners in Hampshire. Judging by the ordinary rules of evidence, I had not the shadow of a reason, thus far, for connecting Sir Percival Glyde with the suspicious words of inquiry that had been spoken to me by the woman in white. And yet, I did connect him with Anne Catherick, because he had now become associated in my mind with Miss Fairlie; Miss Fairlie being, in her turn, associated with Anne Catherick, since the night when I had discovered the ominous likeness between them? Had the events of the morning so unnerved me already that I was at the mercy of my delusion which common chances and common coincidences might suggest to my imagination? Impossible to say. I could only feel that what had passed between Miss Halcombe and myself, on our way from the summer-house, had affected me very strangely. The foreboding of some undiscoverable danger lying hid from us all in the darkness of the future, was strong on me. The doubt whether I was not linking together a chain of events which even my approaching departure from Cumberland would be powerless to snap asunder—the doubt whether we any of us saw the end as the end would really be—pestered me more than once during the rest of my walk. Poignant as it was, the sense of suffering caused by the miserable end of my first, presumptuous love, seemed to be blunted and deadened by the still stronger sense of something obscurely impending, something invisibly threatening, that Time was holding over our heads.

I had been engaged with the drawings little more than half an hour when there was a knock at the door. It opened, on my answering; and, to my surprise, Miss Halcombe appeared on the threshold.

Her manner was angry and agitated. She caught up a chair for herself, sat down, and gave her one; and sat down in it, close at my side.

"Mr. Hartright," she said, "I had hoped that all painful subjects of conversation were exhausted between us, for to-day at least. But it is not to be so. There is some underhand villainy at work to frighten my sister about her approaching marriage. You saw me send the gardener on to the house, with a letter addressed, in a strange handwriting, to Miss Fairlie?"

"Certainly."

"That letter is an anonymous letter—a vile attempt to injure Sir Percival Glyde in my sister's estimation. It has so agitated and alarmed her that I have had the greatest possible difficulty in composing her spirits sufficiently to allow me to leave her room and come here. I know this is a family matter on which I ought not to consult you, and in which you can feel no concern or interest—"

"I beg your pardon, Miss Halcombe. I feel the strongest possible concern and interest in any thing that affects Miss Fairlie's happiness or yours."

"I am glad to hear you say so. You are the only person in the house, or out of it, who can advise me. Mr. Fairlie, in his state of health and with his horror of difficulties and mysteries of all kinds, is not to be thought of. The clergyman is a good, weak man, who knows nothing out of the routine of his duties; and our neighbors are just the sort of comfortable, jog-trot acquaintances whom one can not disturb in times of trouble and danger. What I want you to do is this: ought I, at once, to take such steps as I can to discover the writer of the letter? or ought I to wait, and apply to Mr. Fairlie's legal adviser to-morrow? It is a question—perhaps a very important one—of gaining or losing a day. Tell me what you think, Mr. Hartright. If necessary had not already obliged me to take you into my confidence under very delicate circumstances, even my helpless situation would, perhaps, be no excuse for me. As it is, things are, I can not surely be wrong, after all that has passed between us, in requesting that you are a friend of only three months' standing."

She gave me the letter. It began abruptly, without any preliminary form of address, as follows:

"Do you believe in dreams? I hope, for your own sake, that you do. See what Scripture says about dreams and their fulfillment (Genesis xl. 8, xli. 25; Daniel ix. 16–25); and take the warning I send you before it is too late.

"Last night I dreamed about you, Miss Fairlie. I dreamed that I was standing inside the communion rails of a church; I on one side of the altar-table, and the clergyman, with his surplice and his prayer-book, on the other.

"After a time there walked toward us, down the aisle of the church, a man and a woman, coming to be married. You were the woman. You looked so pretty and innocent in your bridal white and veil, and your long white lace veil, that my heart felt for you, and the tears came into my eyes.

"They were tears of pity, young lady, that Heaven blesses; and, instead of falling from my eyes like ordinary tears that we all of us shed, they turned into two rays of light which shined nearer and nearer to the man standing at the altar with you, till they touched his forehead. The two rays sprang in arches like two rainbows, between me and him. I looked through them, and I saw down into his inmost heart.

"The outside of the man you were marrying was fair enough to see. He was good looking, in nor short—he was a little below the middle size. A light, active, high-spirited man—most fresh and fair-looking for his age, to look at. He had a pale face, and was tired over the forehead, but had dark hair on the rest of his head. His beard was shaven on his chin, but was let to grow, of a fine rich brown, on his cheeks and his upper lip. His eyes were brown too, and very bright; his nose straight and handsome and delicate enough to have done for a woman's. So he looked the same. He was troubled from time to time with a dry cough; and when he put a cross on his white right hand to his mouth, he showed the red scar of an old wound across the back of it. Have I dreamed of the right man? I know best, Miss Fairlie; and you can say if I have described you, and, when I shall see you beneath the outside—I entreat you read, and profit.

"I looked along the two rays of light, and I saw down into his inmost heart. It was black as night; and in the midst of it was a mass of flaming letters which are the handwriting of the fallen angels, and which spell nothing but remorse. He has strewn with misery the paths of others, and he will live to strew with misery the path of his own life. Such is the man's past; and then the rays of light shifted and shattered over his future. And there, before him, stood a fiend, laughing. And the rays of light shifted once more, and pointed over your future; and there, too, was the fiend, and he sat weeping. And the rays of light shifted for the third time, and united between the future you and that man. They widened and widened, thrusting you both asunder, one from the other. And the fiend came between you, with rage-service in vain; it was gone out of the dark, and he was gone with it, and was lost with him in despair. And I woke with my eyes full of tears and my heart beating—for I believe in dreams.

"Believe, too, Miss Fairlie—I beg of you, for your own sake, believe as I do. Joseph and Daniel, and others in Scripture, believed in dreams. Inquire into the past life of that man to whom you are on the point of giving the words that make you his miserable wife. I don't ask you to take warning on my assertion of the future. I have an interest in your well-being that will live as long as I draw breath. Your own conscience is not an illiterate guide, and I hear—for your mother was my first, my best, my only friend."

There the extraordinary letter ended, without signature of any sort.

The handwriting afforded no prospect of a clew. It was remarkably uniform in size, in the cramped, conventional, copy-book character, technically termed "small hand." It was fine, but not delicate, and traced by blots, but had not enough to distinguish it.

"The letter is not an illiterate letter," said Miss Halcombe, "and, at the same time, it is surely too incoherent to be the letter of an educated person in the higher ranks of life. The reference to the bridal dress and veil, and other little expressions, seem to point to it as the production of a woman. What do you think, Mr. Hartright?"

"I think so too. It seems to me to be not only the letter of a woman, but of a woman whose mind must be—"

"Deranged?" suggested Miss Halcombe. "It struck me in that light too."

I did not answer. While I was speaking, my eyes rested on the last sentence of the letter:

"Your mother's daughter has a tender place in my heart—for your mother was my first, my best, my only friend." Those words, and the thoughts which had just escaped me in the sanctity of the writer of the letter, acting together upon my mind, suggested the wholly false and literally afraid to express openly, or even to encourage secretly. I began to doubt whether the writer of the letter was in reality in her right mind. Miss Halcombe's own words, "I believe, too, Miss Fairlie," were standing inside the communion rails of a church; I, lorn little Crozier, isolated in his own desert island of solitary penal disgrace.

The door, when we got round to it, was ajar; and the schoolmaster's voice reached us plainly, as we both stopped for a minute under the portal. "Now, boys," said the voice, "mind what I tell you. If I hear another word spoken about ghosts in this school, it will be the worst for all of you. There are no such things as ghosts; and, therefore, any boy who believes in ghosts, believes in what can possibly be true, and a boy who belongs to Limmeridge School, and believes in what can possibly be untrue, is a boy who is a coward and an idiot, and must be punished against reason and discipline, and must be punished accordingly. You all see Jacob Postlethwaite standing up on the stool there in disgrace. He has been punished, not because he said he saw a ghost last night, but because he is too impudent and too obstinate to listen to reason; and because he persists in telling his reason; and because he persists in telling his story after he knows he has told him that no such thing can possibly be. If nothing else will do, we will send for the ghost out of Jacob Postlethwaite; and if the thing spreads among any of the rest of you, I mean to go to work further, and cause the ghost to visit the whole school."

We seem to have chosen an awkward moment for our visit," said Miss Halcombe, looking upon the door at the end of the schoolmaster's address, and blushing like fire.

Our appearance produced a strong sensation among the boys. They appeared to think that we had arrived for the express purpose of seeing Jacob Postlethwaite caned.

"Go home and tell your mother to dinner," said the schoolmaster, except Jacob. Jacob must stop where he is; and the class may bring him his dinner, if they feel so pleased."

Jacob's fortitude deserted him at the double disappearance of his dinner and his tormentors. He cried, but we little expected to find ourselves occupied in exorcising a ghost. What does it all mean? We could hardly question the boy.

That wicked boy has been frightening the whole school, Miss Halcombe," said the master, when he saw a gentle interest awakening in the mistress. "And he has still persists in his absurd story, in spite of all that I can say to him."

Most extraordinary," said Miss Halcombe. "I should not have thought it possible that any of the boys had imagination enough to see a ghost. This is a new sensation in itself to the idea of forming the youthful mind at Limmeridge—and I heartily wish you well through it, Mr. Dempster. But, in the mean time, I have a plan to propose to you on more, and what it is I want."

She then put the same question to the schoolmaster which we had already asked in the street—every one else in the village. It was met by the same discouraging answer. The schoolmaster had not an idea on the stranger of whom we were in search.

We may as well return to the house, Mr. Hartright," said Miss Halcombe, "the information we want is evidently not to be had here."

She had turned to Mr. Dempster, and was about to leave the school-room, when the forlorn position of Jacob Postlethwaite, gazing ruefully at us on the stool of penitence, attracted her attention as she passed him, and moved her strong good-humoredly to speak a word to the little prisoner before she opened the door.

"Your foolish boy," she said, "why don't you beg Mr. Dempster's pardon, and hold your tongue about the ghost?"

"Do I, miss? I saw t' ghaist," persisted Jacob Postlethwaite, with a stare of terror and a burst of tears.

"Stuff and nonsense! You saw nothing of the kind. Come, come, Jacob! You must not stop there all day."

"I beg your pardon, Miss Halcombe," interposed the schoolmaster, a little uneasily—"but I think you had better not question the boy. The obstinate folly of his story is beyond all belief; and you might find him incorrigible."

"Ignorantly, what?" inquired Miss Halcombe, sharply.

"Ignorantly shocking your feelings," said Mr. Dempster, looking very much discomposed.

"Upon my word, Mr. Dempster, you pay my feelings a great compliment in thinking them weak enough to be shocked by such an article as that!" She turned with us as she spoke, at a distance to little Jacob, and began to question him directly. "Speak the truth, my boy, and let us know all about this. You naughty boy, when did you see the ghost?"

Yeste'een, in the gloaming," replied Jacob.

"Oh! you saw it yesterday evening, in the twilight? And what was it like?"

"Ar! in white—as a ghaist should be," answered the ghost-seer, with a confidence beyond his years.

"And where was it?"

"Away yander, in t' Kirk-yard—where a ghaist ought to be."

"As a ghaist should be, indeed! a ghaist ought to be—why, you little fool, you talk of the manners and customs of ghosts had been familiar to you from your infancy! You have got your story at your fingers' end, at any rate. I suppose I shall hear next that you can actually tell me whose ghost it was?"

"Eh! but I just can," replied Jacob, nodding his head with an air of gloomy triumph.

Mr. Dempster had already tried several times to speak, while Miss Halcombe was examining his pupil; and he now interposed resolutely enough to make himself heard.

"Excuse me, Miss Halcombe," he said, "if I venture to say that no one can be more ready than I am to see the boy asking him these questions."

"I will merely ask one more, Mr. Dempster," she said then; "I shall be quite satisfied. Well," she continued, turning to the boy, "and whose ghost was it?"

"The ghaist of Mistress Fairlie," answered Jacob, in a whisper.

The effect which this extraordinary reply produced on Miss Halcombe fully justified the anxiety which Mr. Dempster had shown to prevent her from hearing it. Her face crimsoned with indignation—she turned sternly on Jacob with an expression of wrathful terror—then broke into a fresh burst of tears—opened her lips to speak—but, by some marvellous effort, controlled herself—and addressed the master instead of the boy.

"It is useless," she said, "to question a child as old and as ignorant as that he says. I have little doubt that the idea has been put into his head by some of the grown people in this village, Mr. Dempster, who have forgotten the respect and gratitude due from every one of us to my sister's memory. I will find them out, and, if I have any influence with Mr. Fairlie, they shall hear of it."

"I hope—indeed, I am sure, Miss Halcombe —that you are mistaken," said the schoolmaster. But the latter lapse and sank with the boy's own perversity and folly. He saw, or fancied he saw, that Miss Halcombe's secondary evening, as he was passing the church-yard, and the figure, real or fancied, was standing by the marble cross, which was the most conspicuous object in the little enclosure to be the monument over Mrs. Fairlie's grave. He bowed, and bit the very air out of the school-room.

Throughout the whole of this interview I had stood by, listening attentively, and drawing my own conclusions. As soon as we were alone again, Miss Halcombe saw me; and I had formed an opinion on what I had heard.

"A very strong opinion," I answered; "the boy's story is, to my mind, the story made perfect. I confess I am anxious to see the monument over Mrs. Fairlie's grave, and to examine the ground about it."

"You shall see the grave."

She walked on, without any further reply, and reflected a little as we walked on. What has happened in the schoolroom, Mr. Hartright," she said, completely distracted my attention from the subject of the letter, that I feel a little bewildered about it. I will not ask you to give up all idea of making any further inquiries, and wait to place the thing in Mr. Gilmore's hands."

"By no means, Miss Halcombe. What has happened in the schoolroom encourages me to persevere in the investigation."

"Why does it encourage you?"

"Because it has confirmed a suspicion I felt when you gave me the letter to read."

"I am getting more and more puzzled, Mr. Hartright, for concealing that suspicion from me till this moment?"

"I was afraid to encourage it in myself. I thought it was utterly preposterous—I distrusted it as the creation of some perversion in my own imagination. But I can do so no longer. Not only the boy's own answers to your questions, but even a chance expression that dropped from the schoolmaster's lips in explaining his story, have forced me to the conclusion that the boy may yet prove that idea to be a delusion, Miss Halcombe, but the belief is strong in me, at this moment, that the ghost which haunts the church-yard, and the writer of the anonymous letter, are one and the same person."

She stopped, turned pale, and looked me eagerly in the face.

"What ghost?"

"The schoolmaster unconsciously told you. When he spoke of the figure that the boy saw in the church-yard, he called it 'a woman in white.'"

"Not Anne Catherick!"

"Yes, Anne Catherick."

She put her hand through my arm, and leaned on it heavily.

"I don't know why," she said, in low tones, "but those words, and the sudden suspicion of yours that seems to startle and unnerve me. I feel as if something dreadful was coming. Look at me, Mr. Hartright," she went on, "I will show you the grave, and then go back at once to the house. I feel as if my nerves have left me all alone. I find better go back and sit with her."

We were now at the church-yard gate, and spoke. The church, a dreary building of gray stone, was situated in a little valley, so as to be sheltered from the north wind by the rising of the moorland all round it. The burial-ground widened, from the church to the gate, like the way up the shoe of the hill. It was surrounded by a rough low stone wall, and was here and there open to the moor, except where, at one place, a brook trickled down the stony hill-side, and a clump of dwarf trees threw their narrow shadows over the short, meagre grass. Just beyond the brook and the trees, and not far from one of the three stone stiles which afforded entrance, at various points, to the church-yard, rose the white marble cross that distinguished Mrs. Fairlie's grave from the humbler monuments scattered about it.

"I need go no farther with you," said Miss Halcombe, pointing to the grave. "You will let me know if you find any thing to confirm the idea you have just mentioned to me. Let us meet again at the house."

She left me, and descended at once to the church-yard, and crossed the stile which led directly to Mrs. Fairlie's grave.

The grass about it was too short, and the ground too hard, to show any marks of footsteps. Disappointed that the next looked attentively at the cross, and at the square block of marble below it, on which the inscription was cut.

The natural whiteness of the cross was a little clouded, here and there, by weather-stains; but rather more than one half of the square block beneath it, on the side which bore the inscription, was free from discoloration. The other half, however, attracted my attention at once, by its singular freedom from stain or impurity of any kind. I looked closer, and saw that it had been cleaned—recently cleaned, in a downward direction, by some hand that had passed between the part that had been cleaned and the part that had not, with sensible wherever the inscription left a blank space of marble—sharply traceable as a line that had been produced by artificial means. Who had begun the cleaning of the marble, and who had left it unfinished?

I looked round me, and saw that the question was to be solved. No sign of a habitation could be discerned from the point at which I stood—the wide, lonely burial ground was left in lonely possession of the dead. I returned to the stile, and looked round it till I came to the back of the building; then crossed the boundary wall beyond, to another of the stone stiles; and found myself on a little path, which led through into a deserted stone quarry. Against one side of the quarry a hut had been built for shelter; and just outside the door an old woman was engaged in washing.

I walked up to her, and entered into conversation about the church and burial-ground. She was very communicative, and almost the first words she said, informed me that her husband filled the two offices of clerk and sexton. I said a few words about the price of Mrs. Fairlie's monument. The old woman shook her head, and told me that she had not seen it—at least, I understood her husband's business to look after it; but he had been so ailing and weak, for months and months past, that he had only been able to crawl into church on Sundays to do his duty, and the monument had been neglected accordingly. I asked if the work was a little better now; and, in a week or ten days' time, he hoped to be strong enough to go to work and clean it.

This information—extracted from a long rambling answer, in the broadest Cumberland dialect—left me exactly where I had started to leave the poor woman a trifle, and returned at once to Limmeridge House.

The partial cleansing of the monument had evidently been accomplished by a strange hand. Conversing with the boy, Jacob Postlethwaite, with what I had suspected after hearing the story of the ghost seen in the village, I was something more to confirm my resolution to watch Mrs. Fairlie's grave, in secret, that evening: returning it as a matter of course, and waiting with it till night fell. The work of cleansing the inscription might be renewed at any time by the person by whom it had been begun might return to complete it.

On getting back to the house I informed Miss Halcombe of what I intended to do. She looked surprised and uneasy while I was explaining my purpose; but she made no positive objection to the execution of it. She only said, "I hope we may not wait in vain," and left me, when I spoke again, I stopped her to inquire, as calmly as I could, after Marian's health. She was in better spirits; and Miss Halcombe hoped she might be induced to take a little walking exercise while the fine weather lasted.

I returned to my own room to resume setting the drawings in order. It was necessary to do this, and doubly necessary to keep my mind employed on my thing that would help to distract my attention from the one subject, from the one future that lay before me. From time to time I paused from my work to look out of the window and watch the sky as the sun sank nearer and nearer to the horizon. On one of those occasions I saw the boy Jacob leave the walk under the window. It was Miss Fairlie.

I had not seen her since the morning; and I had hardly spoken to her then. Another day at Limmeridge was all that remained to me; and after that day we might never look upon her again. This thought was enough to hold me as the river holds the swimmer who struggles for her, to arrange the blind so that she might not see me if she looked up; but I had no strength to resist the impulse to look myself, my eyes, at least, follow her as far as they could on her walk.

She was dressed in a brown cloak, with a plain black silk gown under it. On her head was the same little straw hat which she had worn on the morning when we first met. A veil was attached to it now, which hid her face from me. Her hair was tested a little Italian greyhound, the pet companion of all her walks, smartly dressed in a new scarlet collar, which kept the sharp air from his delicate skin. She did not seem to notice the dog. She walked straight forward, with a firm, free step, carrying a light, her arms folded in her cloak. The dead leaves which whirled in the wind before me, when I had heard of her marriage engagement in the morning, whirled in the wind before her, and rose and fell and scattered themselves at her feet, as she walked on in the pale waning sunlight. The dog shivered and trembled, and pressed against her dress impatiently for notice and encouragement. But she never looked down to him, but went farther and farther away from me, with the dead leaves whirling about her on the path—walked on till my aching eyes lost sight of her no more, and I was left alone again with my own heavy heart.

In another hour's time I had done my work, and the sunset was at hand. I got my hat and coat in the hall, and slipped out of the house without seeing any one.

The clouds were wild in the western heaven, and the wind blew cold from the north. The sun the shore was, the sound of the surf swept over the intervening moorland, and beat drearily in my ears as I walked. I entered the church-yard. Not a living creature was in sight. The place looked lonelier than ever, as I passed the cross, and waited and watched, with my eyes on the white cross that rose over Mrs. Fairlie's grave.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

CONGRESS.

On Monday, December 12, in the Senate, the Slavery question was disposed of—Messrs. Hammond, Bayard, Pugh, Johnson, Trumbull, and Douglas.——The House was not organized, the parties being Messrs. Kilgore, Sherrill, Haskin, Hickman, Florence, and Nodl. No vote was taken for Speaker.

On Tuesday, December 13, in the Senate, speeches on the Slavery question by Senators Clark, Wade, Hale, and Wilson.——In the House, in the session, Slavery was discussed as the only matter in Mr. Morris, Rhode I. Stokes, Adrain, Hickman, and Clark. Pelton, Florence, and Haskin were also discussed.

On Wednesday, December 14, in the Senate, Senator Wade spoke on the Slavery question.——The question of Senator Green's resolution to inquire into the facts which gave the Arsenal at Liberty, Missouri among the property to be sold under Senator Crittenden's bill was put to the vote, and lost by 32 to 28; after which Senator Green moved to lay the whole matter aforesaid on the table; but the question confirmed Mr. Amers J. Morris, of Rhode Island, Mr. Gilmer, Mr. Sickles, Seidy, deceased.——In the House, eleven speeches on Slavery were made—by Messrs. Curtis, Pendleton, Smith, Ashmore, etc. Another ballot for Speaker was taken, the following result: Sherman, 81; Bocock, 66; Gilmer, 23; scattering, 11.

On Thursday, December 15, in the Senate, the Committee was appointed under Mr. Mason's resolution. It consists of Messrs. Mason, Davis, Hunter, and Doolittle. Some other routine business was transacted, and the Senate adjourned over to Monday.——In the House, Mr. Sherman, Mr. Bocock, Mr. Gilmer, Mr. Howard, Mr. Pendleton and Crawford. Two inconclusive ballots were taken for Speaker, 14 in both ending in no choice; Mr. Sherman in both obtaining 116; Mr. Bocock, 88; Mr. Gilmer, 23; Mr. Howard, 1; the rest, 3. The House then adjourned over to Saturday.

On Friday, 16th, in the House, the Senate not being in session, Messrs. Sherman, of Ohio; Bocock, of Virginia, of Kentucky, delivered speeches on the relations between the North and South. Mr. Sherman's speech was considered their remarks. The House proceeded to ballot for Speaker, with the following result: Sherman, 116; Bocock, 86; Gilmer, 26; scattering, 8. No election. On the ballot Mr. Sherman received the votes of every member but Mr. Gilmer, but the Democrats declined to follow their example. Mr. Sherman, of Ohio, was the nominee of the Republican party, of Virginia, of the Democratic party, of Kentucky, of the Opposition, and representative of the Harper's Ferry guilt. Mr. Sherman's election by the Republicans to five offices: Sherman, 111; Bocock, 83; Bayless, 15; scattering, 8. There being no choice the House adjourned.

THE SOUTHERN NEWS OF THE SLAVERY QUESTION.

On Tuesday Senator Clay, of Alabama, made a speech in which he spoke of the fact that he was appointed in the State of Maine in 1835 Senator Wade declared that the North and South would not exist together except as the English and the Russians. Such a sentiment has been often avowed by the most distinguished men of the North (forward, not now in his seat. He has threatened to withdraw from the Union if the Republicans did not take considerable of the language and to submit arms on that soil by the Senator from Ohio (Mr. Wade). Such Senator Seward and Mr. Wilson, and the last Senator from Massachusetts (Mr. Wilson) characterized as murderers. "The New York Herald considered us as a perfidious, privileged class, and charged us with theft, perfidy, and abuses." "I can then express my sorrow as stupid, apathetic, ignorant of the character of our institutions, and the genius of our people, when we suppose this man not the exponent of the sentiments of this party? Are the resolutions of Republican State and Territorial and advocates of sentiments which are congenial to the minds and hearts of the people of the North? Is he [could] sensibly offended [and] it was well and severe ture of Massachusetts, under a Republican administration, has passed an act for the purpose of nullifying the Fugitive Slave Law. She distinctions the lawyer who dares to appear for the claimant of a fugitive slave. She threatens the judge who dares to try any such case with impeachment and removal. She announces the approbation of her decision. As the Senator does not deny it, I take it for granted I am right in saying that such statutes are unconstitutional. Which has been the legislative action of New Hampshire, Vermont, Rhode Island, Maine, Connecticut, New York, Michigan, and Wisconsin. All of these have nullified, as far as they could do so, the Fugitive Slave Law of 1850, which was to enforce the execution or the sending or shielding the execution of that act. Now, I am not one Senator that I think will get up and in the presence of an American Senate proclaim to the American people that these States are constitutionally act, gross infractions of the Federal Constitution, and that they ought not to be met by any action whatever by that Government. Such a doctrine is a treason in our hearing boldly, and with apparent fearlessness of security, that your speech tended to encourage treason. It has all the Constitutional rights of the South. Can you make a boundary in the face of the sun? Can you by a think to persuade us to credit these assertions, when I see you have to deny the existence of the sun to prove it please, these acts of your Legislatures—when you all state, and in private acknowledge that they violate your principles and sentiments? * * * Why should you get up and express your sentiments of the duty of the Executive to organize your party from any quarter, when you know that the Executive has no such duty? You found a letter mockery and ridicule, and you denounce that crime as deserving the execration of all civilized people? * * * Do you not know more than non—that we have no pride of home, pride of State, and pride of country? If you do not, you have no right with your professions of fraternal regard, and invite me to reciprocate your friendly feelings.

WHAT THE SOUTH INTENDS, AND WHEN.

Mr. Crawford, of Georgia, on Thursday, spoke as follows: "What is my duty? We intend to secede. Now we think the South understands you. You have got a majority of the people of the North, and you have got a majority of the Congress. You have got a majority in this House, in the other branch of Congress a majority of sixty-three in the Electoral College, and a majority in every branch of the government; and what do you propose? First, an instantaneous repeal of the Fugitive Slave Law. Next, the doctrine of your leading men. Next, the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia. Next, the abolition of the slave-trade between the States. But the most important ingredient of the party is the prohibition of slavery in the Territories by a positive law, and to put this governmental proposition on the statute-book for you can nail it. I am reminded, too, that you propose to repeal the Constitution, which is the only guarantee we have. My opinion is that the recent invasion of Virginia will prevent your carrying the election of 1861. But for myself, I am ready for you to put the experiment to the touch-stone. I want the question tested between you and us. I am ready for it. I want to know whether we are to be controlled—whether we are to be limited to where slavery can exist, or whether we are to have the right to go beyond? We have now four millions of slaves. In some twenty-five years more we will have eight millions. We demand expansion. We will have extension in spite of the Republican party and all the powers of earth. In the Old and of the New World. [Applause from the Democratic benches.] All we ask is to be let alone. Let us go and we will not trouble you. We will not ask you to repeal your laws. We will not think away from. [Hastily.] Stand by your colors. But I deem it proper to say the following ideas that you intend to do justice to the South. [Applause from the Democratic benches.] [Laughter from Benches.] Now, in regard to the election of a Black Republican President, I think you ought to wait for the sentiment of every Democrat on this floor from the State of Georgia—every one will submit to the election of a Black Republican President. [Applause from some of the Southern Democratic and Border State benches.] Stop! I repeat it, Sir, and I have authority to say so, that no Democratic representative from Georgia on this floor will ever submit to the inauguration of a Black Republican President. [Applause from Democratic benches.]

The Virginia orator could not conclude without asking the gentleman why he would prevent it?

Mr. Crawford. "That will be for the people to determine, Sir; and we do not propose to give our reasons the benefit of the information. We have been driven to it by years to settle this question. It is impossible now that we can do so. Many of my people look upon the Union, or independence out of it. For myself, I declare that I am for independence out of the Union." [Applause.]

THE REPUBLICAN VIEW OF DISUNION.

On Wednesday, Senator Wade, of Ohio, took occasion to speak to disunion. He alluded to the unprecedented character of disunion meeting his ears from the Southern benches, spoken in case to Republicans, and directed to them, felt no alarm from that cause. This Union will not easily be dissolved. Gentlemen should be calm and reasonable this way, as though it was a magazine to be blown up whenever they choose to apply the match. The Union has been more than eighty years in building, and will not be destroyed in a day. No Republican would dare to vindicate his right to the Presidential chair. He will do it. So must all Republicans. The Republican party threats of disunion which are from the South. Will you not stand by the Union also? There is no law requiring you to give up your offices. You can hold them. Government between you. There is no way in which it can be effected. Instead of all in the government being divided. If you will fill a Republican President is elected, you will have united with him. If you will not, you do it now, when you have the government in your own hands? I say to you in regard to but a very few offices that are elected by a majority of the votes of the American people, and consequently confined to those States which

A MERRY
HAPPY
5th AVENUE

RISTMAS AND EW YEAR
HRISTMAS.
ST. STREET

CHRISTMAS-EVE.

BY GEORGE ARNOLD.

I.

Oh, such a wee little stocking
As Clare by the fireside hung
When the Christmas-eve fire was waning,
And the Christmas-eve hymn was sung;
Oh, such a wee little stocking,
So dainty, so snowily white,
That she hung on a branch of green holly
Ere bidding us all "Good-night!"

II.

What shall I put in her stocking?
Some pleasant book?—or a rhyme?
Shall I write her a precious lyric
Of love and the holiday time?
No: books are better for scholars—
At least they are silent friends;
My rhymes, glad they are many,
But there their virtue ends.

III.

Then what shall I put in the stocking
That the tiny maiden hung
On the twig of red-berried holly
When the Christmas-eve hymn was sung?
Let me put my heart in the stocking—
A fitting gift it would be;
But my heart—it is large—it is boundless—
And the stocking is dainty and wee!

IV.

Well, here is the ring on my finger,
I've worn it for many a year;
'Twas the gift of an ancient comrade
Whose memory I hold dear.
But nothing on earth I treasure
So much but that she might say,
"Oh, give me this if you love me!"
And bear it—a trophy—away.

V.

So I drop my ring in the stocking—
She knows it is mine, full well
Good comrade, I profess, forgive me!
Keep still—you could tell!
I drop my ring in the stocking,
So dainty, so snowy, so small—
Oh, Clare, if Christ's eve love thee,
May God love and cherish us all!

VI.

Ah me! my heart is boundless.
The stocking is dainty and wee;
But love has a wonderful magic,
And wonderful power on me!
When I dropped my ring in the stocking,
Breathing that earnest prayer,
My heart went in with the jewel,
A present for maiden Clare!

ITEM: ONE PAIR OF BLUE EYES.

WHOEVER cares to get at the balance of this inventory of charms, eke the property of one Lizzy Robertson, can now come into the store and overlook the guardianship of one George Markham, artist, most kind this store through to wit and. I have not yet determined at what point therein Miss Lizzie shall come upon the stage.

She was the only school friend, George Markham, returned to our little New England city, his birthplace and home, from Rome, after an absence of many years in Italy, devoted to the study of his chosen profession—painting.

He left as a thoughtful, quiet boy of seventeen. He returned a man of twenty-six, bearded, sunburned, self-reared, grave, but good-will.

George was left an orphan at the age of seven, and was at that time adopted into the family of a maternal uncle, a worthy and large-hearted shipcarpenter, who, though he had a growing family of his own to provide for, could not find it in his little toy thrown helpless upon the tender mercies of strangers. This uncle, by name Williams, gave to George such an education as was within his limited means; gave him shelter, food, and clothing; and using the boy's decided talent for the scholar trade of ship-building, and his just as decided bent for drawing and sketching, was kind enough not to oppose his strongly, but permitted him to devote his scant pocket-money and spare hours to a rudiment master of design, which carried his pupil quickly through the elements of outline, shading, and perspective, and then left him to shift for himself—that being, in fact, as far as he could carry him.

As fortune George entered a "store" as clerk. On his seventeenth birthday he started for Italy, with bright hopes, a scant wardrobe, a few gold and silver English books, and the immense sum of two hundred and fifty dollars, the savings of his young lifetime, whereupon to live out the lonely days of his novitiate in art.

Arrived in Rome, he went earnestly to work. His letters spoke little, even of his hopes, but they were never gloomy. Besides amusing descriptions of the strange sights and people he met (scraps of which from time to time gained admission to the columns of our weekly paper, to hound Mrs. Williams's great diagnost), and enthusiastic words on the wonders of art with which he was delighting and instructing himself, there was very little. Nothing, in fact, except, in his letters to Mr. Williams, always an assurance that he was conscientiously using his opportunities, and that he hoped by-and-by to accomplish something—which last was so modestly vague that I fear it gained him little credit with any one but Mrs. Williams, who in her sweet heart firmly believed him a budding Michael Angelo. Good woman!

How he lived through those days—this young art-student—I have never discovered. Two hundred and fifty dollars could not hold out forever even in the Eternal City; and what came after I even in the Eternal City; and what came after I can not imagine—never, thank fortune! having been at Rome or an art-student myself. Doubtless there was earnest and honest and modest endeavor, cheered by the sometimes faint but never-absent voice within which assures the man that he has found his vocation in life. Fancy Rembrandt somewhere over Spanish Jews' clothes, who, full of faith—and incident good works, let us say—so ingenuously depicted those old places that ever after there would seem to be no opening of the letter save, for young men. I suspect that George was oftentimes conveniently hungry, and had long need of a new coat ere he got it. But these are by-gones, and a four-season is past; and George has been dead to aught added to ripen the hopes of those days into the fair fruition of them.

George Markham was a man who did become so far proficient in his art as to by-and-by to attract the attention of his countrymen. Even perhaps some liberal-hearted Americans gave him orders which enabled him to work more at ease. Good again with honest Mrs. Williams's joy when so much of young Markham's success was heralded to the town in our most established family. Had big-typed messenger of stake news.

Nine years were passed when George returned to us, with a reputation which was long absence, as in part beforementioned, much hair, some reputation, and a very pretty wife—a sister of the "Windabout's Security Bank," part of which last he devoted, as was right, to canceling the old uncle's property of his nephew. Which he good Uncle Williams, while the balance was quite sufficient to warrant him in so doing, was not at all averse to enjoying a holiday he had fairly earned.

Now our town is a place famous for summer amusements—boating, bathing, fishing, idling, fifting, picnicking, what not. There are plenty of ways of spending the long days of midsummer, as sundry merchants of your great Gotham know to their cost, whose wives and daughters make their earliest appearance annually, heralding the expiration of Mr. Merriam's heated term. George, of course, spent the summer with us. Indeed, his absence the little town had grown, after the manner of American towns, to be nearly a city—a place of its wealth and fashion—before wealthy and fashionable. To their credit be it said, that George, who had in the mean time become famous, was not the fashions of the season. His studio, where he had unrolled a few of his paintings, and set up his modest easel and palette, was, of course, a mecca for pilgrims, many more admiring, some not lacky young fellows, who could ask. Invitations to boating and fishing parties, to picnics, to tea (we do not give dinners), were showered upon him. He was petted, and, to sit quiet, jolly old uncle was hailed by friends. My friend was not a man to be spoiled by kindhearted young fellow; but he would have been a brute had he not seen and enjoyed the liking of his townsmen.

Being now, as I have said, in his twenty-seventh year, and having made no great progress hitherto for domestic happiness, a hearth of his own, et cetera, it seemed to me that this was the time for George, as a reasonable man, to look around him for a wife. Business called me to editor of this journal, and will he must begin to look out for a wife (I have had with promptness and dispatch), I, who am, I trust, a reasonable man, have always held that certain things being equal, to marry some young woman with a portion of her own.

With these views of life, and my love for George, I did not behold without a certain degree of disfavor the establishment of a very intimate relation between my friend and a young woman of my acquaintance, the Lizzy Robertson before named, who therefore became an object of interest to me. A great pet of my wife's, and much at our house, was a charming child, bright, quaint, fairy-like, and blue-eyed; an orphan and penniless, being dependent upon an uncle, who could bestow upon her nothing more than a home and the benefits of his or her education, and a home. A sweet little girl, who had to accept whatever in that no one of the kindest petted her but also gave her good advice; and yet, so perfect that no man but a fool would have risked all his soul's happiness for the sake of her trying to amend her. One can not help feeling a great pity for such one, at least, of the many products of our republican school system, which so democratically jumbles together poor and rich; and while doing something a common good between the social extremes, is, I fear, more apt to affect the poor with a false estimate of things than to infuse republican simplicity into the hearts and minds of the wealthier. Looking at Lizzy, one was tempted to say that she was entering a boundary and with that "there might be no brambles or painful prickers in the way, at least, of which should be strewn with roses; it should lie through bowers where there was no spring, autumn, nor winter, but a perpetual summer." Which sentiment would never wither it. The base word, Money, should never be breathed near it."

If George had been a rich man, here, I think, had been a wife just suited to him. But not for a poor man. Lizzy was a heartless little coquette.

It is but fair to say that, as communicating my views to no one, I was entirely unaware of the dullness utterly to look at the matter with me; declaring bluntly that people ought to trust a little, in such cases, to Providence, the world ("which is good enough in the main," said this unsophisticated woman), and to themselves. Attempting, moreover, to clench her sophistries by asking if I, the reader's humble servant, "thought of such things when courting her?"

"If my dear young friend," said I, entering the studio, where I found him in blissful contemplation of his cigar-smoke, "I understand you are making up to that Lizzy Albertson." I opened the ease in this wise in order, if possible, to take the wilness by surprise.

"Will!" said George, very little ruffled, I must confess.

"It is no! well; she's poor," said I, righteously scorning all subterfuge, and coming at once to the point.

"Well?"

"She's shy, frail, unsophisticated creature, who will make some wealthy man a happy wife if she has a heart big enough for her. She is bright and pretty, and tolerably good; but she has not strength enough to struggle with poverty and adversity. You will only try your kinds. You ought to do better.

"Bosh!"

"Now cause my last and best shot.

"And so ought Lizzy. Such as she are meant to enjoy, and to be comfortable. With a husband who can afford to cherish and indulge her, she will live her natural life out. With you—poor fellow! Lizzy, let's spread selfish in you to ask her to be your wife."

George was not much of a mathematician, but he had studied Euclid enough to know that a straight line is the shortest distance between two points.

"That looks fair," said he, in reply to my last. "I'll go over and ask her about it."

Will you believe it? The fellow actually went over to my house, stated the case honestly to Miss Lizzy, and (of course!) was accepted!

That was the end of my match-making. They were married in the spring of winter, and immediately removed to New York, that centre of art and money. Up to their removal I was frequent and sunny. Up to their removal I was the one to whom both parties to this rash wooing; to lecture them on economy and self-denial; to alarm them by eloquent pictures of the miseries of poverty. But what availed my croakings when their hearts were filled with love-thoughts? Besides, the future—terrible drawn by Cupid's own manscrip? To such young people as these life seems to promise a certain thing, and the problem of happiness and fortune is solved before it is read. What dreams they dreamed! Of a cot vastly rent and snowy. Up to their removal I was the one to whom they came for the taste and industry of the wife should make up for all monetary deficiencies in the way of a quiet and discreet life, wherein these two love-struck lean should be a happy oil in oil to each other; of the great summer-place, artistically sketched in thought, by which George should achieve fame and wealth, as he painted on canvas the brush; of a consequent tour through Europe, revisiting, with her his loved best, the long-familiar scenes and life of Italy—a well-earned reward, surely, to settle down to, in old age, among congenial spirits? What avails the rehearsal? Many are all alike dreamed such dreams and seen such visions?

So they removed to New York, where George set up his studio and began his hours of leisure between his wife and the master-piece, which last was to be his first great work, the real key to the pointer. For to produce this master-piece needs not only will but thought, experience, study—for which, indeed, may not the unimportant parts of all true genius? Here George worked out hopeful days thus a bitter contrast to the days which he had ever hoped to see. The man who has a vocation he loves, and can afford to work at it, who has a wife, love, and hope, and can make cheerful; who has youth, health, a good brain, and a reasonable share in his profession—surely this man need ask no more of this world's goods.

In our day, the theory of so-called respectable mediocrity is rife, that every man of family has an income of at least five thousand a year; the exception is, a "scarf and sponge on the backbone" ties of your friends for society until you move into your brown stone front. Wherefore Mr. and Mrs. George Markham never "moved" into New York, had my hearty approval when they moved out of it and into a modest country cottage, where, as I remarked, he and his Lizzy could "make as much noise as they pleased," which was, to be sure, an important consideration. Here the young wife, thrown upon her own resources for house management, came out in a wonderful way, which inspires me to say that it is no easy matter for stupid teachers, and a more stupid system of society, to spoil a genuine woman.

To say no more of society, our lovers—that is to say, George and Lizzy—were established in their country cottage, which my wife, having paid it a visit of inspection, pronounced a kind of terrestrial paradise, without serpent or forbidden fruit.

To the winter of 1855 Mr. and Mrs. Williams, George's uncle and aunt, were living in some desire on a health trip. The children, four in number (the eldest two had died years before), were all grown up, and married until the youngest reform—all except Ruth, the youngest, who came to George. Here it was in which the parents usually never been heard from. Weeks and months elapsed without news from the absent; and at last, late in spring, it was found out too certain that, in the bitter storms of that winter, the ill-fated bark had gone down with all on board, and lost. What was to become of them?

Of course it was a great and unexpected misfortune; and every body felt excessively sorry for the poor things whose future was thus so strangely severed with one fell out with want. But the sympathy don't fill the stomachs or clothe the backs of orphans—more's the pity! and with all our sorrow these might have been put on the street had not George at once made up his mind to care for them as for his own flesh and blood, rightly conceiving this a proper return for the obligations conferred upon his own childhood.

But how? The scant income of a young artist makes but a sparing pot of his own to boil. Whereas with two additional mouths to feed, the baker's, tailor's, shoemaker's, and teacher's bills adequate to the furnishing of these four young comrades, souls, and brains? Has any one who reads this experienced the almost hopeless and helpless despair of a conscientious man who sees suddenly looming up before him some great duty, seemingly impossible of fulfillment? A rock not to be avoided, and which, in his poor mariner thinks surely to make shipwreck? Only one who has known this bitter experience can appreciate the state of mind in which my poor friend found himself while thus divided between duty and—duty.

On one side Conscience: "You owe every thing to the parents of these children. Dare you see them starve?"

To which Expediency: "But you have your wife, and—pretty future, you know. There lies your first duty. And have you not paid abundantly, in hard-earned money, this debt of Conscience?"

Conscience: "Was your debt to be paid with money?"

Expediency: "But your wife—your future? Can you discharge this duty, if duty it is to be, without heartlessness as wrong, and determined—she is a woman—to have the last word): "A man can ask you to do his duty."

"I sat and tore my hair and puzzled my brain about the matter—reproached myself for having married—debated myself the short responses of my married life—thought you, my prudent friend, a very Solomon, and myself a fool—was thankful that I had not seen as you did—when suddenly two white arms encircled my neck, and the dearest face in the world looked lovingly into mine. 'I think, my dear, you had better go on to-morrow and bring back the children. All will be right then for them when you get them here. Now drive away the clouds from your face. I know you have been speaking on some late my gilt-edged, all sorts of horrid things, and I should deserve it all if I plead for a moment against your generous duty. Let us work together, my dear husband, and courage! Don't forget that there is a Providence.' And I my prudent friend, to be a hypocrite. And with such words of holiest comfort to my heart, my dear one rose off to get dinner at the table. That settled the matter," said George, repeating his wife's words with tears in his honest eyes.

The children came to George, in the little cottage, which seemed before lastly big enough to contain themselves, suddenly grown small to the accommodation of all the new-comers. They did not starve, as George had half imagined they would; indeed, that winter in the cottage, Mrs. George, by some potent sorcery made her allowance hold out nearly as well as ever. "And really you have no idea, Mr. Smith," said she to me, not long after, "how much they help us about the house. Active little bodies, all of a hundred things for me, and gladly, which would cost me worlds of money otherwise. I love them as though they were our own; and they fill the house —and indeed the whole garden—with the cheerful music of their childish prattle and laughter. I'm sure I could not do without them; and then," winking demurely at her husband, "I George we've got them at a great bargain, for they have all had the measles and hooping-cough."

Having now sufficiently begun to do this plain but hard duty, if I were merely inventing a pretty story, I think I should be tempted to make George have some rich curmudgeon of an uncle die, full of years and dollars, and will a fortune to the most deserving of nephews and heroes. But the prudence of story-tellers differs somewhat from the Providence of Life. Men do die, it is true, in the world; but God accepts the honest sacrifice, and divinely turns it to the giver's greatest good. There has come around in the great year, I am sorry to say, no rich uncle or other pecuniary convenience. I have to report that it has required no little contriving on the part of Mrs. George, and no slight labor on that of her husband, to duly join together and support the five. But it is done. George had a new coat oftener in his early days, in Italy even, than he has now; and we have the best reason (for gentlemen) that good Mrs. George has not had a new silk dress in nearly three years. It took the entire savings of a two years' sale to purchase what the little woman liked better, a piano, which looks rather out of place, truly, in the little sitting-room, but which Lizzy enjoying. In fact, though they have managed to keep body and soul together, and to support and educate their little family, my wife and I agree that they have had monstrous difficulties to contend with, and that we rule to account for their happiness. They do not seem to mind though. I do not know a more blithe or cheerful little woman than Lizzy, who goes singing up and down the house all day, in very vulgar good health (not being able to afford a piano to practice on), the color of the richest peony in her garden. As for George, high art was too high for him, as the world counts artistic matters, which he does so well, and with so pleasing a grace (as though the highest aspiration of life were to succeed in taking a good likeness of Mr. Alderman Bloggs), that if the days should happen to grow double their length in the coming summer, I am sure all his hours would be filled with sitters.

And the master-piece? Well, the master-piece is laid over. Many a good man and true, in this world, has had to put it away from his hand—better work for the master-piece. And the world jogs on all the same; as though master-pieces were not to be done sometimes—think I sometimes think is very nearly the case.

And Italy? Kind reader, I am sorry; I do not think little Lizzy will ever see Italy, nor George ever show her the scenes of his early fears, hopes, and triumphs. They have their hopes and their plans; but there are disappointments in all lives; and that man is to be pitied who thinks to do a real duty without sacrificing something. Lizzy will scarcely see Italy; but Harry Williams goes to college next year, fully prepared, and Jeannette, his eldest sister, is fond of her class in the best girls' school in the country. Tommy and Ruth will take their turns in time; and to them will probably succeed a couple of youngsters of laughing brown eyes Lizzy would not give for a dozen Indies.

When I read sometimes, in my morning paper, of the gay parties and fine winter doings in Washington and elsewhere, where the American citizen trades and the fountain of social pleasure—when my friends boast of American beauty or grace abroad—when I think of the many "good men and the great world bobbs out to one who has not only a beautiful face but a good heart and a bright spirit; reading of these things, I sometimes think longingly of our little Blue Eyes, with her eager enjoyment of life, her too fine spirits, and keen appreciation of all innocent pleasures and all beautiful things. I wish that Ruth could have been here, to say to myself, she would have shone among the fairest and brightest. None would have more enjoyed, many would have looked more and seemed as these.

But, on the whole, do you pity her, reader?

NICK.

A CHILD'S STORY.

THERE dwelt in a small village, not a thousand miles from Lloyd-land, a poor man, who had no family to labor for or friend to assist. When I call him poor, you must not suppose that he was a loafer, a wanderer, trusting to charity for a night's lodging; on the contrary, his stone house, with its green window-seat flower-pots, was the prettiest and snuggest in all the place, the doctor's only excepted. Neither was there any lack of generous rustic plenty: his yard was supplied him with milk, eggs, mine; low: his farm supplied him with milk, eggs, mutton, butter, poultry, and cheese in abundance; his table was kept supplied with beef, pork, and wheaten bread; his orchard with fruit and cider, and his kitchen garden with vegetables and herbs—in some herbs. He had, moreover, health, an appetite to enjoy all these good things, and strength to walk about his possessions. No! I call him poor because, with all these, he was discontented and envious. It was in vain that his neighbor's trees were the most productive by a single bunch; it was in vain that his lambs were fat as butter-balls, if some one else's sheep bore twins: so, instead of enjoying his own prosperity, and feeling glad when his neighbors prospered too, he would sit grumbling and bemoaning himself as if every other man's riches were his property. And then to see that one day our friend Nick leaned over Giles Hodge's gate, counting his chickens.

"Ten," he muttered, "I wish I were sparrows to eat them up, or a blight to kill your fine trees altogether."

The words were scarcely uttered when he felt a tap on his shoulder, and, looking round, he saw that a little rosy woman, no bigger than a butterfly, who held her tiny fist clenched in a menacing attitude. She looked carefully all into, and all round him, and listen, you churl you; housekeeping you shall straightway become every thing you wish; and the mind you must remain under one form for at least an hour." Then she gave him a slap in the face which made his head ring as if it were a bell-clapper him, and disappeared with just so much sound as a dew-drop makes in falling.

Nick rubbed his cheek in a pet, pulling wry faces and showing his teeth. He was boiling over with vexation, but dared not utter it in words, for some unlucky wish should escape him. Just then the sun seemed to shine brighter than ever, the wind blew spicy from the south; all Giles's roses looked redder and larger than before, while his cherries seemed to multiply, and swell. He felt he could refrain no longer, but, heedless of the fairy, could refrain no longer, but, heedless of the fairy, could refrain no longer, exclaimed, "I wish I had a gift he had just received, and almost in the same moment, exist—

None could than done; in a moment he found himself a whole flight of hungry birds, peckers, pickers, and tearers, all busy at the destruction of the envied cherry-trees. But fair be devastate the wretch hard by; for that honest Giles was on the watch hard by; for that very morning; it had struck him he must make sure for the protection of his fine fruit. Forthwith he ran home, and opened his window-shutter and fired, charged with quite a marvelous array of barrels. Pop, bang—go, bang! he made short work of it. The sparrows, and soon reduced the enemy to one crestfallen lipped with broken leg and wing, who limped to hide himself under a bush. But Nick was not done with him. The fun was over, the hour was out; so Nick must needs sit out his allotted time. So he sitting down shower came down, which soaked him through his torn ruffled feathers; and then, exactly as the last drops fell and the sun came out with a beautiful glow, rainbow, a tabby cat pounced upon him. She'd himself up for lost, he chirped in despondency, I wish I were a dog to worry you!" Instantly—for the hour was just passed—in the grip of his horrified attorney, he shook himself, and was a bull-dog. A shake, a deep bite, and poor puss was out of her pain. Nick, with immense satisfaction, tore her for to bits, wishing he could, in like manner, exterminate all her progeny. At last, glutted with vengeance, he lay down beside the dead cat, curled his tail about his heels, and fell asleep.

Now that tabby cat was the property and special pet of no less a personage than the doctor's lady; so when dinner-time came, and not the cat, a general consternation prevailed: the household and kitchens were searched, the cellars, the attics, every apartment was ransacked; even the doctor's dog's kennel was visited. Next the stable was rummaged; then the hay-loft; lastly, the bereaved lady wandered disconsolately through her own private garden into the shrubbery, calling, "Puss, puss!" and looking so intently up the trees as not to perceive what lay close before her feet. Then it was that unawares she stumbled over Nick, and trod upon his tail.

Up jumped our hero, snarling, biting, and running at her with such blind fury as to miss his aim. She ran, he ran. Gathering up his strength, he took a flying-leap after his victim; her foot caught in the spreading root of an oak-tree: she fell, and he went over her head, close to the ground, like a stinging-nettles. Then she found breath to raise that fatal cry, "Mad dog!" Nick's blood curdled in his veins. He would have stunk away if he could; but already a stout laboring-man, to whom he had done many an ill turn in the time of his humanity, had spied him, and, kindgeon in hand, was preparing to give chase. However, Nick had the start of him, and used it too; while the lady, far behind, went on vociferating, "Mad dog, mad dog!" Incidentally, servants, and finally neighbors, the pursuit. Finally the whole village came pouring into its aim at the heels of Nick.

The dog kept ahead gallantly, distancing more and more the unathletic doctor, Giles, and, in fact, all his pursuers except the lodgeon-bearing laborer, who was just near enough to persecute his tail. That tail, however, was destined to be its next over, and so kept forming wish after wish as he ran—that he were a viper only to get behind one, a thorn to run into some one's foot, a mantrap in the path, even the detested sledgehammer into its aim at the heels of Nick. Nick was half mind at the propitious moment; the bull-dog vanished; and the laborer, overreaching himself, fell flat on his face, while the weapon struck deep into the earth and snapped.

A new pursuit was instituted after the missing dog, but without success. During two whole days the village children were exhorted to keep their doors closed, and the dog-catcher had an unoffensive cur was hanged, and the panic subsided.

Meanwhile Nick, who had run his shortest stick, walked home in silent wonder, pondering on the mysterious disappearance. But the puzzle was soon explained. Scarcely had he entered his mind not to tell his wife the whole story till after tea. He found her sitting at the window, with her head and cheese set out, and the kettle singing softly on the fire. "Here's something to make you happy, my dear mother," said he, presenting our hero between the bars and seating himself; "for I'm mortal tired and hungry."

Nick crackled and blazed away cheerfully, throwing out bright sparks and lighting up every corner of the little room. The cat sat down to cheese to a nicety, made the kettle boil without spilling a drop, set the tea-pot on the hearth-rug, and then handed the pots and pans into splendor. It was provocation enough to be turned; but to contribute to his misfortune by a fit of laughter at the adventures was still more aggravating. He heard, too, all their remarks and wonder at his sudden and mad dog, and saw the doctor's lady's own maid bring the laborer five shillings as a reward for his exertions. Lastly, he overheard orders as to what should be purchased with the gift, till at last it was resolved that they should all indulge in a feast with real glass. The prospect of their grandeur put the finishing-stroke to Nick's indignation. Striking up a sudden flame, he set fire to all his might that he were fire to burn the cottage.

Forthwith the flames leaped higher than ever flames leaped before. It played for a moment about the beam, and smoked it thoroughly; then, fastening upon the wood-work and the stone-corner, flashed full into a blaze. The laborer ran for help, while the wife, a timid woman, threw open the door, and, extracting two pails of water on the floor and set to work with a brave courage. He danced upon the rafters, and cast a pewter-pot and a pot of butter, licked up the latter, and was just eyeing his way through the bedroom, when through the thatch and down the chimney came a rush of water. The flames fell and expired for the moment; and before he could recover himself, a second and a third discharge followed, and were completely extinguished. The laborer are long to one blue flame, and entirely surrounded by a wall of wet ashes. Nick sat and watched the whole the good-natured neighbors did their best to remedy the mishap—saved a small remnant of furniture, and the kindest words of sympathy, accompanied by wishing himself six rich old man who lived in a hand-some house just beyond the turnpike. In this wish he learned out.

The last glimmer had scarcely died away, when Nick found himself in a tall bony room with faded curtains, and occupying the centre of a large room. A night-lamp burned on the chimney-piece, and he could but so discern a few shabby old articles of furniture, a scanty carpet, and some writing materials on a table. The room was cheerless and dreary; but for his comfort he felt an inward consciousness of a good supper—thick stewed meat and rich gravy, and of sundry precious documents hidden in a secret cupboard in the wall.

So he lay—and listened to the clock in the clock ticking, the mice squeaking, and the house-dog barking down below. Then he whispered, not a barking down below. Then he whispered, not a sleep, and whispered in answer. Then he started in its sensitiveness influence by sinking into a fantastic dream—a dream of money-chests. He was broken open, then shipwrecked, then burned; lastly, some men in masks, whom he knew instinctively to be his own servants, began dragging it away. He lay still, and tried in vain to pierce the shadows that rest upon the future. The great depth of heaven seems to lift me toward it, but hands of love and sweet voices draw me back to the long-gone days of youth. I must go with them.

May's face is before me—the bright, happy face, not the shadow that came after—and with the face the strange life it led passes, scene by scene, to the end. I will tell the story; but not all. The reader must fill it for himself.

Mary Ray loved Frederick Waterton. She was beautiful and rich, he was noble and poor. They met together by Clear Spring, playing with the pebbles. His arm was around her, and she rested on his shoulder.

"And so your father has come for you?" said the young farmer. "You have grown up since he spoke last—you're a woman now. You say you spoke last—what did he say?"

An expression of pain ran over her face as he spoke, and he chided himself without speaking.

"What did he say?" he repeated, looking curiously at her face. "Are you willing to tell me?"

"I will tell you," she said; and, with her cheek-ing her little hand tightly. "You must hear it now or later and I may as well tell you."

"Why do you stop?" he asked, laughing at her blushes.

"If I loved you!" she said; and now her voice was firm.

"And what did you answer?"

"I told him the truth—that I did love you with all my soul."

"And he? what did he say?" cried Waterton, eagerly.

"He said nothing then; he only kissed me, and went out without saying a word. Now, don't interrupt me! Hear it all! I did not see him again for a month. Then he came into my room and talked for more than an hour with me. He said—" She stopped, looked up, and burst into tears.

"Never mind what he said," he murmured, trying to soothe her.

"And what he said," she repeated, "I must tell you. I took it conscious of a dream he waited to see the issue. She turned; she was the wife of the Frenchman! She came down the aisle. I grew unaccountably nervous. I was watching Wharton. He grew paler and paler, until the pallor of his face was corpselike. I took him by the arm and tried to drag him away, but he grasped my wrist and held me powerless. She approached; and when she was close to us she made some motion as if she raised her eyes. She saw Waterton. Dropping her husband's arm, she sprang with a cry like to an unseen power. Her cold, passionless features flushed radiant with joy; her eyes dilated; her lips parted as if she wished to speak, and she stretched out her hands toward him. He was moving toward her; but suddenly a change came over him, and he stood with convulsive agony. She motioned him away; then, with a low wail, fell back into her husband's arms. As her head sunk on her breast as orange-blossom was shaken from her bridal wreath, I heard Wharton's foe. He seized it, and, before I could turn, was gone.

A bruised flower from her bridal wreath; it was his Christmas gift, flung to him by the cold metal. He hand of Mammon!

GIFT THE SECOND.

FRED WATERTON was alone in his own home in the city: the evidences of luxury—and we were numerous in the room where he sat. He had gold enough then, which years of incessant toil had won; stores of gray among the mountains, and splendid mirrors to show them; the young farmer, fresh and well-read, had become a polished gentleman, Mr. Waterton the banker. Fifteen years of unrelieved labor lay between him and the night when she was married, but they could not shadow the splendid misery, the awful mastery of that wedding. The gold is not his, for he had wedded his daughter was Catholic, and high mass exorcised the unholy union; what matter if the trembling saint was overwhelmed by the crushing weight of jewels! Ambitious fathers, plotting mothers, are to blame for such sacrifices; every hell flower whose lurid glare shall cover with red gloom the soul's Hereafter!

The banker sat alone in his library; it was his birth-night, the anniversary of all the evil that darkened his life—it was Christmas-eve. As he sat watching the dry bitter thoughts rose in his mind and clamored his face. The lines of pain mattered, through his clenched teeth; "had it not been for cursed gold she might be with me now, clear against my heart!" He rose and paced the laughter rang faintly through the hall, and his face lighted up. This banker was eccentric, for on every Christmas-eve he gave a dinner to the beggars, and he would have them old; none under sixty years sat there; always old, with gray hairs, and never the same. Three hitters spoiled May's mom, and the fourth was dark symbolized winter; he was eccentric, and the connection could be made between those odd men and his lost love was in his own breast. At the same time the door-bell rose, and, drawing aside a curtain which concealed a door, he showed a group of servants at the dinner. The beggars were merry over the wine; the old fellow near the door must have been merrily exiled; and he was standing, with his back to the banker caught his closing—"And when the woman saw emerging through a cave of rock, and the damp sod is over us, may bright, happy children gather round Ann, and lay their little faces close against her, and laugh over her—over her—over whites—" he closed the panel, and threw himself upon the lounge, and lay groaning in agony. The old man's wish had shown the banker the revelation that brooded over his future; his life was barren solitude stretching on to death. Could he, unlily the burst of passion passed away, and he began to talk to himself in a half-delirious way. "Why do the ashes fall that way? A castle—so, a church —and the mourners are gray as if with moonlight. Graves! Graves! Horror! Horror! I am mad! And if she be, she is at rest, and her spirit is about me now! The innocent world is a remorse of youth, a life of love! Hark! what a wail is on the wind to night; again, the same sound!"

He had started to his feet, and was listening. Again it came, the same sound, murmuring through the house, low, mournful, like the wail of a lost child. He went to the window and looked out on the night. The sky was covered with huge masses of dark-gray clouds, which moved here and there, showing the deep blue depths beyond steel-fed with stars gleaming like diamonds on a field of jet. Again the same sound; and this time it was clear and distinct. He entered the hall; it was there, and came from the door which opened on the street. He was at the place in a moment, and as he turned the knob a strange and unutterable fear seized him. Fred Waterton was no coward; but he was white with terror then. Close at his feet lay a human figure, in woman's clothing, crouching as not for as if through agony. He waited, but the figure turned not to see him or to raise its presence. He spoke to it, softly and kindly, but there was no answer, only the moaning sound which grieves novelists of pain. He stooped down and touched it; it was the woman—for it seemed such—started, half rose to her feet, and fell back again. He put his arms under her, and, lifting the ragged agony, carried her in and laid her down before his fire. It was a strange action for a banker to do, but he did it. There was no struggle, no movement, only a drawing up of her limbs as the bright flame flickered over her face, quite purple from cold. He tore off her miserable bonet, he chafed her feet and hands, he applied brandy to her temples and lips; he warmed her back to life, until she sat staring in wonder at him. She had a strange face, old and yet young, as if starvation had shriveled its youth, and stamped it with the decay of age. Long black hair hung in tangled curls about it, and the deep sunken eyes were lit with an unnatural brightness. The features were regular and perfect in outline. He saw that she had been beautiful.

"Where am I?" she said, faintly, rising as she spoke. "You are very kind: I was so cold and hungry."

She had been studying her face, and the sound of her voice seemed to confirm a horrible fear that had risen in him; seizing her by the arm, he led her under the gaslight.

"Is Heaven's name who are you, woman, girl? Speak!" he muttered. "Why do you look at my face. "Why are you here? Speak!"

"I am Ann Wharton," she answered, trembling at his fixed look. "I don't know why I am here, nor how I came."

"Wharton, you lie!" he said, fiercely. "It's a trick you're playing! May Destin Who gave you the name?"

"Mother gave it to me," said the girl, and her voice trembled with emotion. "Why should I lie about my name? Why do you look at me so? Let me go from here; let me go beg!"

"Your mother? Who—where is she?" he stammered, pale as death.

"I don't know," said the girl, and big tears rolled down her cheeks. "I was not, just said when father brought me here: we left mother at home."

"Where?"

"France, Paris," answered the girl, wondering at his questions.

"Your father, where is he?" said the banker, fixing his eyes upon her, and speaking in a low tone.

"I don't know," said the girl. "Four years ago I lost him in a crowd; I've never found him since. You know me, sir?"

"Do you speak truth?" said the banker; but the tone of inquiry was unnecessary, and he only spoke was to natural to be feigned. "Yes, I believe you," he went on, "for you have her hair, her eyes, her mouth, her features. You are her likeness, and you shall never be cold again while I have a home. Ann, you say?"

"Like my mother?" said the girl, and her face lit up with a flush, as May's did in the old days. "You know her, sir? Oh, then I have been blessed you for your kindness to me, poor lost one! Let me go now?"

"Never,away from her!" said the banker, drawing the beggar to his breast to hide the hot tears that blinded his sight. "Never away from me, May: together we'll nod her. I'll give you to her, when no one else. You are mine, Ann, mine only!"

"I—I—" murmured the girl; but the words died in a sigh, and she swooned in his arms.—And as she fell forward upon him, he saw her face. Heaven. He took it to the light, and—horrible Heaven! it was the face of the Frenchman's wife! It was the face of May, a Christmas present richer than the Indies, brought to the banker by the frozen beggar!

GIFT THE THIRD.

As soon as his business would allow him the banker sailed with May's daughter for Europe. He had not seen her since the night she left him by the means of adding joy to the heart that had been left so long lone. He had not dared to speak before since they plighted the troth that others broke and forsook; but the wear of time had not dimmed that bright picture, and never more than in the hour of glad impatience for the meeting, and yet sorrow mingled with the joy, did he feel how beautiful she was but found. The police were set on foot, but they could only find that the Frenchman stay was useless, and his business would not permit it. He appointed and augry with himself, he was obliged to return, taking Ann Wharton with him. He gave over the search, despairing of success.

The banker was a man of strong cause and was nearly over before he gained a clew to May's existence. On an evening late in November the banker was called away by a message that a lady had been his playmate in boyhood. The doctor said she was dying, and was somewhat alarmed at the patient laboring under an attack of delirium tremens, that he had found the man quite insane. But he was determined to go. In his ravings for several times mentioned the banker's name with terrible earnestness. At last the doctor said that he felt convinced the Frenchman was the same he had met before. Without further words the banker went with him. The woman was dying, and was raving together. The madman lay on his back, utterly helpless, but his mind was somewhat calm, and the banker saw what a miserable wreck drunkenness had made the victim before him. He did not know the woman, however, but suddenly her become conscious of their presence, and uttering a wild shriek, he started up. Close in bed; and though not more than forty, he seemed old and fifty, for his hair was prematurely thin and gray, and his forehead wrinkled as if with age. With out sufficient strength to rise from the bed, on hands he leaned half back, he muttered incoherent ravings, in which his past life was laid bare to hearers. From these disconnected glimpses the banker learned that the man had been recently deserted his child in the streets of New York, and had abandoned his wife at Quebec. She was May in all probability living there, if any where, the wives of debauchery and crime which the miserable man had made her. He was about to leave, shocking to be told here. On that night he died.

The banker returned to New York, and the next day started for Europe. He was alone the next day left her child, his adopted daughter, with a friend; for he wished to seek May alone. The Frenchman was dead, he himself was rich, and she was still the same May to him. His life had now but one object, to find her; but one hope, to call her his own. Through the long days and nights at sea the hope now kindled in him grew until it filled his soul with glorious light. Shine on, O stars, and cheer the weak heart in his end! Leap, O wave, in your mad play, and lift him onward nearer his destiny! God him with thy sublime strength, O faith, for God is at the helm!

The swift winds have borne him to the haven; crowds fill the wharf, and the fair-traveled one is home again. The face he seeks is not in the jubilant throng. One hand does not clasp his; her eyes does not welcome him; and he sees not the waving flags. A band are playing delicious melodies; but he is longing for her voice, and he can not hear the music. The man has grown young with hope. Memory has become a dream of reckless experience, and dreams that the pictures drawn by fancy are true. It is no matter if the heavens are blue, and the silver shining river rolls like a flood of plenty through the waving meadows, while high in the air the golden corn-fields wave their richly-grown mercials of a former greatness? His eye is open only for her presence, and is blind to all else. Blessed gift from Heaven, natural love, that becomest a vision of bliss to the despairing, thou that comest to mortals with angel wings, thou forgot the banks of Death, making the dark river a path of light!

Again it is Christmas-eve and the town of Cologne is boisterous with mirth; the shops are decked with evergreens and the streets are filled with merry people singing songs. The great cathedral is open, and high mass is being sung. Two blocks away from the cathedral, in a small street, stands a row of old-fashioned houses; in the fifth story of the last house back room is quiet and the only sign by the sneon, which, being in the full, throws a sober radiance into the darkness. A chair, a table, and a bed, and the furniture is all. Not a habitant and noise have not reached this narrow street, for the gayety and the Christmas festivity have gone away to-night: Christmas-eve is a mysterious thing with them. The hum of the city comes up dull and distant, broken now and then by the window-sash rattling in the wind. There is a woman on the bed with the stillness upon her bear her heavy breathing, and at intervals a sharp, gasping moans; the air is cold, and she has no covering over her but a cloak which she is lying. On the table, in a broken plate, are some crumbs of bread, and near them a cup of water, standing in the moonlight. Oh hands to help, find the way soon! Oh eyes of love, be quick; you have no time to waste, for the night is dark. Hark! hear the wind Christmas fires, come out in charity to-night and warm the freezing poor! Gather fragments! Feed your loaded tables and feed the starving! So to him those shall fall they shall receive you into heavenly mansions!

Quietly the moon-beams are creeping from the table to the bed, and from the window-sash to the cathedral chimes float in clear and liquid tones. Hark! some one is in the house coming up the stairs and speaking in a subdued manner; the steps approach, the door opens, and Waterton stands upon the threshold. He has the same delight of his lantern full on the face of the sleeping woman and staggers back: the change in her well-known features was too terrible in its dumb eloquence of sorrow and pain and dead hope. Stooping, while the light flickered over her sunken cheeks, he reverently kissed her forehead; it was cold as ice. A horrible fear seized him, and he caught her by the wrist; it was cold. "Dead! dead!" he said: "I am here! Your own Fred come to save you!" and he laid himself down by her side. The action roused her: she opened her eyes and looked around with a bewildered stare, until meeting his face, with a sudden sound she leaped to her feet. Waterton stood before each other. Her face haggard from the pain of years, and his with sudden joy; her lips moved as if to speak his name; she stretched out her arms toward him, staggered, and fell into them. Her head hung upon his shoulder, and a faint smile, a stiffening of the limbs, and the agony of a life was gone. She died there, and when he had laid her on the bed the moon-beams rested like a halo around her marble brow, as if nature strove to make her innocent as she had been created! The struggle is over: she hath entered into rest: there was joy in heaven that day.

My friend Fred Waterton still lives; but I know he counts the days that keep him from her. The daughter he gave out at his own birth-night is his own age. But the years are rolling, and I know she is waiting beyond the river for his coming: together they will go in through the gates into the city whose bells cease not ringing day nor night.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1859, by HARPER & BROTHERS, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

TRUMPS.

BY GEORGE WILLIAM CURTIS.

CHAPTER LXXXVIII.

A MORNING CALL.

THE days pass, and Time steals away youth, health, beauty, and riches: the days pass, and Time brings disease, decay, change, and poverty, and it is all the silent, quiet, expected, unobtrusive passage of the seasons. The year has passed into serene June: golden, ripe September into sharp, stripped December. There goes a man smiling down the street, grateful, happy. Fifteen years ago he buried his wife and thought his heart was buried with her. There goes a man smiling down the street, grateful, happy. Fifteen years ago he buried his wife and thought his heart was buried with her. There goes a man whist

AT FANNY'S DOOR.

Alfred's eyes grew more sedden and sullen. He had a feeling that whatever money Hope gave to other people was just so much taken from him.

"Come, come," said he, "charity begins at home. What are you going outside of your residence for?"

Hope Wayne was inexpressibly disgusted; but the found an excitement in encountering this boorishness, which served to stimulate her in the struggle going on in her own soul. And she very soon understood her enemy. Smarting, audacious Fanny Newt had become the inert, inefficient woman before her. A clever villain might have developed her, through admiration and sympathy, into villainy; but a dull, heavy brain merely wrenched her. There is a spur in the prick of a rapier; only stupidity follows the blow of a club.

After sitting silently for some minutes, during which Alfred Dinks sprawled in a chair, and yawned, and whistled contrarily to the music, while Fanny sat without looking at him, as if she were deaf and dumb, Hope Wayne said to the husband and wife:

"Abel Newt is ruining himself, and he may harm other people. If there is any kind of assistance, or sympathy, of advice, or remonstrance, or warning—if there is any thing that can be done to save him we ought to do it. Fanny, he is your own flesh and blood. Have you no pity, no feeling?"

She spoke with a kind of despairing earnestness, for Hope herself felt how useless every thing would probably be. But when she had ended Alfred broke out into uproarious laughter:

"Ho! ho! ho! Ho! ho! ho!"

He made such a noise that even his wife looked at him with almost a glance of contempt.

"Save Abel Newt!" cried he. "Regenerate the Devil! Yes, yes; let's send him some tracts! Ho! ho! ho!"

And he opened again until the water oozed from his eyes.

"Well, that is the best joke I've ever heard; Cousin Hope, you shall have the leather medal!"

Hope Wayne scarcely looked at him. She rose to go; but it seemed to her painful to leave Fanny Newt in such utter desolation of soul and body, in which she seemed to be gradually sinking into idiocy. She went to Fanny and took her hand. Fanny listlessly rose, and when Hope had done shaking hands Fanny received them before her inanely, but in air unconsciously appealing attitude, which Hope saw and felt. Alfred still sprawled in his chair, laughing at intervals; and Hope left the room, followed by Fanny, who shuffled after her forgetfully, evidently down at the heel, pattering on the worn oil-cloth in the entry as she shambled toward the front door. Hope opened it. The morning was pleasant, though cool, and the air refreshing after the tainted grease and oil tobacco-smoke odor of the house.

As they passed out Fanny quietly sat down upon the step, leaned her chin upon one hand and looked up and down the street, which, it seemed to Hope, offered a prospect that would hardly enliven her mind. There was something more touching to Hope in this dull apathy than in the most positive grief.

"Fanny Newt!" she said to her, suddenly.

Fanny lifted her heavy eyes.

"If I can do nothing for your brother, can I do nothing for you? Or, rather, can you do nothing for yourself? You run out, Fanny. You will sink into perfect inanity, if you don't take care."

Fanny smiled languidly.

"What if I do?" she answered.

"Why, Fanny, you are young; you are well, except this stagnation of soul and body; you might enjoy life as well as any body; and I really believe now, Fanny," said Hope, obeying the impulse, and relying upon her unconscious perception, "that we might be friends."

Fanny smiled in the same faint way, and pointed over her shoulder into the house with her thumb.

"Well, Fanny, Alfred only sympathizes with you, because you are shut up with him alone. I think you have been pretty well punished; and, after all, I can't think you are so much to blame as the people who made you. You are young, Fanny. I really believe, if Aunt Dagon would be too much for the ten men who are trying to save a city. She'd corrupt them, and then let the city go to destruction. Do you over see her now?"

Fanny for the first time looked interested.

"See Aunt Dagon, here?" — and she looked about her with an air that entirely satisfied Hope. "No, no," continued Fanny, "I've lost my game, It's no use."

Of course 'isn't' any use if you fold your arms and sulk on," said Hope. "I you're drowning, and you won't swim, you'll go to the bottom. But it would be better not to be swim. It's always of use to try, Fanny."

"Try what?" said Fanny, smiling again.

Thereupon Hope sat down by her, and told her just what she meant, and what she hoped, and what she would do. She talked to her. And the anger young woman drew such pleasant pictures of what she would do at home and the probable influences at school, of which Hope perhaps knew quite as much as Fanny, that she not hesitate to say, what she felt she knew, that Abel's interest in Hope had never been any thing but a speculation, that he was pursuing in a fresh blow, and began to believe with Hosea Wynkley.

"I really don't see that you can do any thing," said Fanny, "nor any body else. Perhaps he'll get a new wife and begin praying? I don't know any thing about it."

Hope Wayne shook her head, thoughtfully.

"No," she said, "I see no way. I can only be ready to befriend him if the chance offers."

They said no more of Abel Newt. Hope persuaded Fanny to come to Lawrence Newt's Christmas dinner. "And I will make him understand about it," she said, as she went down the steps.

Mr. Dinks sat upon the door-step for some time. There was nobody to see her whom she knew, and if there had been, she would not have cared. She did not know how long she had been sitting there, for she was thinking of other things, but she was roused by hearing her husband's voice:

"Well, G—d—! that's a G— d— pretty business—sputting on a door-step like a servant girl! Come in, I tell you, and shut the door."

From long habit Fanny did not pay the least attention to the words. But after some time she rose and closed the door, and clattered along the entry and up stairs, upon the worn and ragged carpet. Mr. Alfred Dinks returned to the parlor, pulled the bell violently, and when his stupy servant girl appeared, he began to fret with the staring eyes, he immediately damned them, and wanted to know why in h— he was kept waiting for his boots. The stupy girl vanished, and Mr. Dinks reclined upon the sofa, picking his teeth. But after some time the slop—slop—slop of the girl along the entry. She opened the door, dropped the boots, and fled. Mr. Dinks immediately walked across the room a greater distance than to his boots, and kicked the bell violently. Slop—slop again. The door opened.

"Look here! If you don't bring me my boots, I'll come and pull the hair out your head!" roared the master of the house.

The cowering little creature shoved at the boots with a woe-begone look, and brought them to the sofa. Mr. Dinks took them in his hand, and turned them round contemptuously.

"G—! You call them boots blacked?"

He scratched his head a moment, enjoying the undisguised terror of the puny girl.

"If you don't black 'em better—if you don't put a brighter shine on to 'em, I'll—I'll—I'll—put a shine on your face, you slut!"

The girl seemed to be all terrified eye as he looked at him, and then fled again, while he laughed.

"Ho! ho! ho! I'll teach 'em how—insolent care! G— d— Paddies! What business have they coming over here? Ho! ho! ho!"

Leaving his slippers upon the parlor floor, Mr. Dinks mounted to his room, and changed his coat. He tried the door of his wife's room, as he passed out, and found it locked. He kicked it violently, and howled,

"Good-morning, Mrs. Dinks! If Miss Wayne calls, tell her I've gone to tell Mr. Abel Newt that she repents, and wants to marry him; and I shall add that, having been through the wood, I picked up a stick at last. Ho! ho! ho! (Kick.) Good-morning, Mrs. Dinks!"

He went heavily down stairs and slammed the front door, and was gone for the day.

When they were first married, after the bitter conviction that there was really no hope of old Burr's wealth, Fanny Dinks had carried matters with a high hand, domineering by her superior cleverness, and with a superiority that stung and exasperated her husband at every turn. Her bitter temper had gradually entirely eaten away the superficial, stupid good-humor of his younger days, and her fury of disappointment, carried into the detail of life, had gradually smothered him in all his worst habits and obliterated the humility of better. But the sour, superior nature was, as usual, unequal to the struggle. At last, it spent itself in vain against the massive brutishness of opposition it had itself developed, and the reaction came, and now daily streamed her into hopeless apathy and abject indifference. Having lost the power of saying, and well being really vexed by a being she so utterly despised as her husband, there was nothing left but pure passivity and inanition, into which she was rapidly declining.

Mr. Dinks kicked loudly and roared at the door, but Mrs. Dinks did not heed him. She was sitting in her dingy wrapper, rocking, and pondering upon the conversation of the morning—mechanically rocking, and thinking of the dinner at Uncle Lowsee's.

It was, perhaps, an hour after her husband had gone down town, and she still sat rocking and reflecting, when she heard a little tap at the door of her room.

This time she rose and opened it, and said,

"Good-morning, Mary," in a tone which was somehow different from usual, and yet May could not say how. It was only pleasanter, she knew. But when Fanny told her sister that she was going to Uncle Lowsee's dinner, May jumped up and down, and cried, "Good! good! until Fanny was really pleased, and looked at her with her old pleasant smile.

"It will be a change, any how," said Fanny, as if curious to lead her on.

"Good, indeed!" cried May, and jumped up and down again.

Fanny looked at her sister, and wondered if she were really so happy as she looked and acted.

She tried her.

"Sister, father, May?"

"Poor man; just the same. But you know Uncle Lowsee has been a quiet little house for him and mother and me; and I think father seems more comfortable, somehow, since he is in it: but he isn't changed. Fanny, suppose that we hadn't had any Uncle Lawrence?"

Fanny rose to her sister's mind set inevitably toward the happy view, and said no more. But when May insisted upon dressing her hair for her, and making a dress and a collar that were neither soiled nor torn, although it were a different kind from what she had, and May staid and dined with her; and when Gabriel came for her in the evening, May made her look herself and chat and play a merry game at cards—in which May supplied the merriment—and although Gabriel was in his usual reluctant and, on the way home, asked May what he had done to be treated to such a penance as this, May said to him, gayly:

"Wouldn't you like to have a wife, Sir?" upon which the Junior partner felt somewhat bewildered, not precisely understanding her; but as May and

ADVERTISEMENTS.

Phalon's Cocoin
Promotes the Growth of the Hair.

Phalon's Cocoin
Prevents the Hair Falling Off.

Phalon's Cocoin
Kills and Removes Dandruff.

Phalon's Cocoin
Gives New Life to the Human Hair.

Phalon's Cocoin
Makes the Hair Soft and Glossy.

Phalon's Cocoin
Is the most perfect Dressing for the Hair.

Phalon's Cocoin
Leaves no Disagreeable Odor.

Phalon's Cocoin
Leaves no Sticky Substance.

Manufacturers and Proprietors,
PHALON & SON,
New York.

Bronchitis.

From Rev. S. Seigfried, Morristown, Ohio.—"Having received the most salutary relief by Ayer's Cherry Pectoral from a severe attack of Bronchitis, I write for another supply. I had tried several Coughs and Bronchitis remedies, but none with a relief at all comparing with that experienced from the Cherry Pectoral. Hoarseness and Bronchitis are soon cured by its use."

The Human Hair.—How many persons share this delicate and ornamental ornament, by burning it with alcoholic washes, and plastering it with grease, which has no affinity for the skin, and is not absorbed! Jones's Cocoine, a compound of Cocoa-nut Oil, &c., is unrivalled as a dressing for the hair—is readily absorbed, and is peculiarly adapted to its various conditions, preventing its falling off, and promoting its healthy growth. See advertisements.

ANTI-ARRHYTHIC WINE.—A CERTAIN CURE FOR
GOUT AND RHEUMATISM.
PENFOLD, PARKER & MOWBRY,
Wholesale Druggists,
15 Beekman Street, New York.

Quevu's Cod-Liver Oil Jelly,
The only certain cure for Consumption, Asthma, and all kinds of Coughs, in taken without nausea.
1859.

Quevu's Patent Jellified Castor-Oil.—The greasy sensation of the oil is obviated, and it does not nauseate. Is pleasant to the taste, and highly appetizing for children. To be had of the Inventor, Quevu, No. 120 Fourth Avenue, and at all respectable druggists. Trade, FOLD, CHARLE & MOWBRY, Wholesale Agents, No. 99 Beekman Street.

ABRIDGED EDITION OF RICHARDSON'S MODERN SCHOOL.
With American Fingering. Price $2.

The Modern School for the Piano, by Nathan Richardson, is highly recommended by Thalberg, Dreyschock, Moscheles, Rosenhain, Wehli, Worzischek, Kalkbrenner, and a host of others, equally well known, and whose opinion on Musical matters are without question.

Full Edition, with Foreign Fingering.....$3.
Abridged do., with American Fingering.....$2.
Sent to any part of the United States on receipt of the price.

Published by RUSSELL & TOLMAN,
No. 291 Washington Street, Boston.

HUNGARIAN WINES.—A parcel of superior RED and WHITE HUNGARIAN WINES, in wood and in glass, for sale by
CHARLES E. LOOSEY,
No. 8 Hanover Square, room No. 6.

FINKLE & LYON'S SEWING MACHINES —Warranted to give better satisfaction than any other machine in this market, or money refunded.
N.B.—Price Reduced to $50.
No. 505 Broadway.

Great Reduction in Prices at Genin's Bazaar.
Prices Reduced
IN LACES AND EMBROIDERIES; IN BOYS' AND YOUTHS' CLOTHING; — IN LADIES' HOSIERY — IN GENTS' FURNISHING GOODS; — IN LADIES' GAITER TIES AND SLIPPERS; — IN CARRIAGE'S LEGGINGS; — IN INFANT DRESSES; — IN DOLLS, TOYS, AND FANCY GOODS; — IN WARRENDOS; — IN INFANTS' CLOAKS; — IN LADIES' FRENCH CLOTH CLOAKS; — IN LADIES' AND GENTS' FRENCH FLANNEL SHIRTS; — IN LADIES' CLOTH AND VELVET CAPS AND HATS; — IN GENTS' SILK AND OPERA HATS; — IN LADIES' AND GENTS' FURS; — IN CHILDREN'S FURS; — IN SILVER BRUSHES; — IN GENTS' FUR COLLARS; — IN GENTS' FUR CAPS; — IN LADIES' FUR CAPS; — IN LADIES' FUR ARCTIC HOODS; — IN GENTS' CLOTH AND VELVET CAPS; — AND IN GENTS' SILK HATS. — GENIN'S BAZAAR, Nos. 597 and 513 Broadway.

A Beautiful Complexion.—Laird's Bloom of Youth or Liquid Fruit is the best article in existence for beautifying and preserving the complexion and skin. Its wonderful effects may be seen and tried gratis, at LAIRD'S ladies' hair-dressing establishment, 457 Broadway.

Two Works Valuable to the Sick or Well.
Sent by mail, no pay expected until received, read, and approved.
Address Dr. S. S. FITCH, 714 Broadway, New York.
1st. SIX LECTURES on the causes, prevention, and cure of Lung, Throat, and Skin diseases; Rheumatism, and Male and Female complaints. On the mode of Preserving Health to 100 years. 315 pages. 16 Engravings. —Price 50 cents, in silver or P. O. stamps.
2nd. A work on the Cause and Cure of Diseases of the Heart, Stomach, Liver, Bowels, and Kidneys; on Apoplexy, Palsy, and Dyspepsia; as we grow old and what causes disease. 151 pages, 6 engravings. Price 25 cents, in silver, which keeps you well, giving water, skin, county town, and post office.

Burnett's Cocoaine.
The following testimonial is conclusive of its efficacy in the case of Dandruff.
BOSTON, Oct. 20, 1859.
Messrs. JOSEPH BURNETT & CO.,
Gentlemen.—I have used your Cocoaine about six weeks, and its effect is so marked and extraordinary that I deem it my duty to state it to you.
My worst complaint for several years has been Dandruff, with itching and irritation of the scalp. After brushing my hair, my coat-collar would be covered with white scales, (dandruff,) which looked like a shower of snow.
My barber tried various applications without effect. His share of your Cocoaine, and his obstinate refusal to use it, provoked me to procure and try it.
I have used less than a bottle. The dandruff, and the irritation which caused it, have entirely disappeared, and my hair was never before in so good condition.
Your obedient servant,
A. A. FULLER.

Burnett's Cocoaine.

☞ A single application renders the hair (no matter how still and dry) soft and glossy for several days. It is conceded by all who have used it to be the best and only reliable Dressing in the World.
Prepared by JOSEPH BURNETT & CO., Boston, and for sale by all dealers, generally, at 50 cents a bottle.

Muller's Piano Method—In English and German.
REVISED BY LISZT AND SCHORR.
Two Parts. Price of each, $3. Complete in one volume, $5.
Published by OLIVER DITSON & CO., Boston.

DR. SWEET'S INFALLIBLE LINIMENT is a certain remedy for Neuralgia.

CHRISTMAS AND NEW YEAR'S HOLIDAY PRESENTS.
ALT. J. CROWNE'S, No. 377 B roadway, cor. 4th Street.
GIFT-BOOKS, Beautifully Illustrated.
STANDARD WORKS, in Fine Bindings.
ILLUMINATED JUVENILE and TOY BOOKS.
Splendid assortment of BIBLES, PRAYER BOOKS, OF COMMON PRAYER, bound in Velvet, Turkey, and Calf, etc.
AMUSING GAMES.
CHOICE VARIETY OF LIGHT ARTICLES.
T. J. CROWNE, No. 409 Broadway, cor. 4th Street.

Thimbles versus Scissors.
Steirly's Patent Thread-Cutting Thimbles.
Can be obtained at any fancy retail store.
By the use of this Thimble the operator can dispense with the Scissors, the very injurious properties of the edge of the threads, thereby much time and labor, immediately saved. Sample by mail, 75 cents. Try it, and you will be satisfied!
Wholesale Depot, 13 Wall Street, N. Y.
W. BYRON WHARTON, Agt.

Useful in every house for mending Furniture, Toys, Crockery, Glass-ware, &c.
Wholesale Depot, No. 30 Platt Street, New York.
Address HENRY O. SPALDING & CO.,
Box No. 3,600 New York.

Put up for Dealers in Cases containing four, eight, and twelve dozen—a benefit to Country Shop-Keepers in packing into packages.

Forty Dollars per Month.
500 Agents wanted to travel and solicit orders for the celebrated Patent Fifteen Dollar Sewing Machine. Salary $40 per month, and expenses paid. Address, with stamp enclosed for return postage,
T. M. DAGGETT & CO.,
Boston, Mass.

Paralyzed & Deformed Limbs.
I was completely paralyzed at eight months old, and at thirty-two years old, and have never walked a step until now. I applied to Dr. J. F. MANN, No. 124 West 35th Street, N. Y., and soon restored the use of my limbs, and I can walk with both limbs restored to use.
ELIPHA SHEPARD.
Canton, Mass.

ROSSITER & MIGNOT'S PAINTING,
"The Home of Washington after the War."
On Exhibition at the ACADEMY OF DESIGN, 10th Street, near Broadway, from 9 A.M. to 5 P.M. and from 7 to 9 Evenings. Admission 25 cents.
J. McCLURE.

A Purely Vegetable Compound, Chemically Unknown.
THE AVERDISEASE, OR HAIR INVIGORATOR OF PERUVIAN BALSAM, OR HAIR RESTORATIVE.—Restoring the hair after it has fallen off, preventing the hair falling off, and making a perfect curative and cure for baldness it is unrivalled. As a dressing, every hair and whisker in their original life and color, imparting to them the soft lustre of youth. Sold by all Druggists, and by HARRIS & CO., No. 754 CORTLANDT STREET, Philadelphia.

GREAT CURIOSITY.—Particulars sent free. Agents wanted. SHAW & CRANE, Biddeford, Me.

JUST PUBLISHED.—On Single and Married Life; or, The Institutes of Marriage. By the late R. J. CUTTER, M.D. Price 25 cents, free of postage. For sale by H. DEXTER & CO., 112 Nassau Street, N. Y., and all Booksellers.

Mercantile Record.
Patent Champion Safes.
S. C. Herring & Co., 251 Broadway.
Phelan's Billiard Tables.
O'Connor & Callender, 63 to 67 Crosby street.
H. B. Dodsworth.—Music Store, 6 Astor Place.—Publisher and Dealer in Music and Instruments.
Circulars, Labels and Tags.
Mauger, Victor & , 115 Chambers Street.

The Gift Book of the Season.
Mr. King's Elegant Work.

The White Hills:
THEIR LEGENDS, LANDSCAPE, AND POETRY.
By Rev. T. STARR KING.
Illustrated by Sixty fine Engravings on Wood by Andrew,
From Original Designs by WHITEDOCK.
One vol. Small quarto. Elegantly printed on Tinted Paper.
A work, the most creditable to American Art, of any ever issued.
Expressly designed for the Holidays, and one of the most attractive and valuable works of the season. Author and Artist have combined to make this a work of permanent interest and worth.
CROSBY, NICHOLS & CO., Publishers,
117 Washington Street, Boston.

New Holiday Books,
Just Published by
CROSBY, NICHOLS & CO.,
And for sale by the principal Booksellers in the United States.
FRANK WILDMAN'S ADVENTURES ON LAND AND WATER. By Frederick Gerstaecker. Translated and Revised by Lascelles Wraxall. With Eight Illustrations, printed in oil colors. 16mo. Price $1.
A most interesting and attractive book for the young, equal in every respect to the popular works by Mayne Reid, and illustrated with colored engravings.
MANY A LITTLE MAKE A MICKLE. Tales Translated from the German. By Trowermantel. With Six Illustrations printed in oil colors. 16mo. 75 cents.
HOLLY AND MISTLETOE. Tales Translated from the German of Rosalie Koch. By Trowermantel. With Six Illustrations printed in oil colors. 16mo. Price 75 cents.
These two Juveniles are a continuation of the Series of German stories so deservedly popular. They comprise some of the most delightful stories published for the young, and are fully illustrated with colored engravings.
THE LIFE OF LAFAYETTE. Written for Children. By E. Cecil, author of "The Life of Washington." Illustrated with Six Colored Engravings. 16mo. Price 75 cents.
The second of the series of Lives of the Generals of the Revolution, by a new and popular author. This series is principally adapted for the instruction and entertainment of American children and youth.
THE LIFE OF WASHINGTON. Written for Children. By E. Cecil. Illustrated with Six Colored Engravings. 16mo. Price 75 cents.
An invaluable little book. Every boy and girl in the United States should own a copy of this Memoir of the Father of his Country.
A MOTHER'S HYMNS FOR YOUNG CHILDREN. A beautiful little volume, entirely original, filled with such hymns as every mother would wish her child to learn.
CROSBY, NICHOLS & CO.,
PUBLISHERS,
117 Washington Street, Boston.

FOR SORE, WEAK, INFLAMED EYES AND EYELIDS.
A true specific, and invaluable remedy has been at last discovered. Dr. Hartgloves argues that stem affections invariably result from a constitutional disease, of which the local affection is only the outward manifestation. Hence, HUMPHREYS' SPECIFIC HOMŒOPATHIC OPHTHALMY PILLS are only taken internally, and go direct to the seat of disease. Sore eyes and eyelids, which have resisted all other treatment. All cases of sore and inflamed eyes and eyelids, or failing weak, of whatever kind, are speedily benefited, and the cure of the worst cases in only a question of time.
Price, 50 cents, with directions.
N. B.—A full set of HUMPHREYS' HOMŒOPATHIC Specifics, with Book of Directions, and Twenty different Remedies, in Morocco case, price $5; do. in plain case, $4; case of fifteen boxes, and book, $3.
☞ Sent by mail, to any part of the country, on receipt of the price. Address
DR. F. HUMPHREYS & CO.,
No. 562 Broadway, New York.

HOLIDAYS. HOLIDAYS.
THE OLD CHARDONS SELL CANDY MANUFACTORY, ESTABLISHED 1848.
RIDLEY & CO. are pleased to furnish a superior quality of CANDY, SUGAR PLUMS, &c., for which they have attained a world-wide reputation.
All orders purchased at this establishment are warranted PURE, and free from all admixture of foreign matter, deleterious to health.
CONFECTIONERS' MANUFACTURERS, SACS, &c., &c., suitable for HOLIDAY PRESENTS.
RIDLEY & CO., 566 Chardonets and Hudson Streets.

PHALON'S COCIN.
Read this letter of its great merit.

It Does Make the Hair Grow!
PHILADELPHIA, Oct. 7, 1859.
Messrs. PHALON & SON,
NEW YORK.
Your preparation of Cocin has proven itself very beneficial to me. For a long time I have been gradually losing my Hair, leaving my head in many places entirely bald, and I have only stopped its falling out by using your Cocin, and I now have the pleasure to tell you that my head is covered with young Hair. It is the only preparation of the many I have used that has been successful, and I can safely recommend it to all my friends.
Yours respectfully,
ELIZA CONNELL,
1815, above Vine Street.
This is only one letter out of hundreds we are receiving daily, of the wonderful effects of
PHALON'S COCIN,
Prepared by
PHALON & SON,
New York.

Beautiful! Elegant! Delightful!
A new Discovery!
For Beautifying the Hair!
For Beautifying, Perfuming, Curling, Dressing, Invigorating, Cleansing, Curling, Laying and Setting the Hair.
Imparts a Silky Gloss and Softness,
And at same time a stiffness.
As you dress the Hair so it remains.
Keeps the Hair in position.
Makes the Hair Beautiful.
It's the best agent of the Toilet.
A perfect Gem! A Luxury!
For Ladies' and Children's use.
The most delightful Hair Dressing
For the Beauty, Fashion, and Respectability.
For the Parlor and Toilet.
It's a fortune seller.
FOR FIRST-CLASS TRADE.
Delightful—delightful—delightful!
It should be in every Family.
It's the best preparation
For the Hair—For the Hair
In the World.
In the World
In the World.
Address ISAAC L. SCIPP,
Depot, 79 Ann Street, N. Y., and Boston.
Price 50 cents per box. Sold everywhere.

To Hotelkeepers.—The attention of Landlords is respectfully invited to the superior quality of Burnett's Flavoring Extracts.
They are entirely free from the poisonous oils and acids which enter into the composition of many of the fictitious fruit flavors now in the market. They are highly concentrated, have all the freshness and delicacy of the fruits from which they are prepared, and are less expensive.
PREPARED BY JOSEPH BURNETT & CO.,
Boston.

FRENCH MINK CAPE, Muff, and Cuffs, only $16. WILLIAMS, 344 Fulton St., Brooklyn.

Ladies do you wish a Beautiful Complexion?
If you do, use PHALON'S SNOW WHITE ORIENTAL CREAM, for giving beauty to the complexion, removing Tan, Freckles, &c., and imparting a permanent bloom to the skin. It renders Lily Whites and all cosmetics for the entirely superfluous; it supersedes all such deleterious mixtures. It is the most astonishing preparation, giving a natural color to the cheeks and health to the complexion. It is, in short, the most unparalleled: so simple in its nature, so innocent in its properties and action, and yet so brilliant in its never-failing effects, that it is the admiration of all who see it.

CHRISTMAS is COMING, Ladies. If you wish to make PRESENTS for the Holidays, get beautiful Embroidered Velvet Capes (presents for gentlemen): also, Ladies', Misses', Boys', and Children's Beaver and Seal Caps. Store open evenings.
MILLER & CO.'s, No. 387 Canal Street.

ROMAN EYE BALSAM,
For Inflamed Eyelids,
And for the cure of Scrofulous Ulcers and Soreness surrounding or near the Eye. In all diseases of this character it is almost a certain cure.
Price 50 cents per box. Will be sent free per Mail to any part of the United States upon receipt of 58 cents in Post-stamps.
Prepared by A. B. & D. SANDS, Druggists, 100 Fulton Street, cor. William, N. Y.

HARPER & BROTHERS
Have just Published:
PICTORIAL BIBLE. Harper's Illuminated and New Pictorial Bible. Embellished with Sixteen Hundred Historical Engravings, exclusive of an Initial Letter to each Chapter, by J. A. ADAMS, more than Fourfold the number of which are from Original Designs, by J. G. CHAPMAN.
Morocco, gilt edges, beveled and panelled sides . $25 00
Morocco extra, gilt edges 22 00
Full Calf embossed, gilt edges 20 00
Full Calf, marbled edges, limp 18 00
Full Sheep, marbled edges 16 00
Cloud and forwarded by Express, on receipt of the Money.

THE DIARY OF A SAMARITAN. By a Member of the Reformed Association of New Orleans. 12mo, Muslin, $1 00.

☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send either of the above Works by Mail, postage paid (for any distance in the United States) upon receipt of the price, the Money.

The Sister's Confession.

BY JULIA CAREY RUMBRALDT.

Ah! when he passes in the street,
With such a lordly air,
He lifts his hat—perhaps to show
His brown and glossy hair;
And when he smiles—his teeth are good,
Which makes him smile the more—
I feel it is my destined lot
To worship and adore.

To me he seems perfection—
His eyes with silken lash;
The ruddy glow of his cheek,
His silken dark moustache;
But more than all, my sister,
The point my soul adores
Is that he buys his clothes for cash
At SMITH'S MARGINAL STORES!

"Twin Temples of Fashion."

ONE PRICE—NO DEVIATION.

The Price is marked on all the Goods in Plain Figures.

SMITH BROTHERS,

The Marble Stores,

122, 138, and 140 Fulton Street,

Between Broadway and William St.,

THOMAS SMITH, Jr.,
ROBERT L. SMITH,
J. SMITH BELL,
} NEW YORK.

Watches and Jewelry,
At No. 11 Wall Street, Up Stairs.
Special and Important Notice.
At half price for a few Days.

Gold Watches, 18 karats, only $15, worth $30.
Sterling Silver Watches, only $7 worth $16.
Every style of Watch from $2 to $100.
Also a splendid assortment of Jewelry.
Only for a few days to make room for other Goods.
J. MACDUFF'S, 11 Wall Street, up stairs.

MUSICAL BOXES,

Playing 2, 3, 4, 6, 8, 10, 12, 16, 24, and 36 tunes,
PAILLARD & MARTIN, Importers,
Musical Boxes repaired. 21 MAIDEN LANE, N. Y.

ENGLISH PICKLES REDUCED in PRICE.—Send for a priced list of our English and Scotch Provisions. RICHARDSON & McLEOD, 103 Maiden Lane, New York.

Wistar's Balsam of Wild Cherry.

This remedy has long been cherished by the community for its remarkable efficacy in relieving, healing, and curing the most obstinate, painful, and long-standing cases of COUGH, COLD, INFLUENZA, SORE THROAT, BRONCHITIS, WHOOPING COUGH, CROUP, ASTHMA, INFLAMMATION of the LUNGS: while even CONSUMPTION itself has yielded to its magic influence, when all other known means have failed.

The whole history of this Balsam, which has now become a household word, proves that the past has produced no remedy approaching it in value and usefulness, while the future will hardly present one of equal value.

To guard against Counterfeits, of which there are several worthless ones, see that each bottle has the written signature of "I. BUTTS," as well as the printed name of the Proprietors, "Seth W. Fowle & Co., Boston," on the outside wrapper.

Sold by Druggists and Dealers everywhere.

Wistar's Balsam of Wild Cherry.

Partial Deafness Discharges from the Ear
NOISES IN THE HEAD, CATARRH,
And all diseases of the THROAT, EYE and EAR, pecularly cured by
DR. LIGHTHILL, No. 27 Bond Street, N. Y.
☞ Pamphlets sent gratis.

Agents Wanted
To obtain Subscribers for
LOSSING'S
PICTORIAL FIELD-BOOK OF THE REVOLUTION.
In Two Volumes Royal Octavo, containing upward of 1500 Pages and
1100 Beautiful Illustrations.

This work will be SOLD EXCLUSIVELY BY AGENTS, in each of whom a special District will be given. Rare inducements offered. Applicants should learn the Counties for which they would prefer. For full particulars address GEO. W. ELLIOTT, late MARSH & BROTHERS, New York.

Harper's Holiday Pictorial Now Ready.

The most beautiful Pictorial Sheet ever issued.

PRICE SIX CENTS.

Sent by mail anywhere in the United States on receipt of the price.
HARPER & BROTHERS, Franklin Square, N. Y.

Piano Fortes,
Of the newest style, finest tone, and lowest rates.
HALLETT DRUG & MANUFACTORY,
Warerooms No. 99 Prince, near Broadway.

Boudoir Sewing Machine.
Harris' Patent.

The best and only reliable double-thread Machine making the celebrated GROVER & BAKER STITCH by authority, at $40.

Every Machine warranted for one year.

L. A. BIGELOW, Agent,
43 TREMONT STREET, Boston,
and 504 Broadway, New York.

Singer's Sewing Machines.

SINGER'S No. 2 SEWING MACHINE, $100.
SINGER'S No. 1 SEWING MACHINE, $90.
HEMMING GAUGES REDUCED TO $1.

Singer's Family Sewing Machines at $50 and $70 are capable of performing, in the best style, all the sewing of a private family.

Send for a copy of I. M. Singer & Co.'s Gazette, which contains full reliable information about prices, machine, etc., of Sewing Machines, and will be supplied gratis.

I. M. SINGER & CO.,
No. 458 Broadway, New York.

READ THE PROFOSAL AT THE FOOT OF THIS.

THE NEW YORK OBSERVER.
THE LEADING RELIGIOUS JOURNAL IN THE WORLD.
National, Conservative and Religious.
DEVOTED TO THE INTERESTS OF RELIGION, AND TO NO SECT OR DENOMINATION.

Edited by a corps of Clergymen and Laymen of large experience, having the most eminent writers of the day among its regular contributors, and a Foreign Correspondence unrivalled. It is the most complete that can be made: published on a large double sheet, at least 48 columns. No other newspaper is made upon this plan.

FAMILY NEWSPAPER

TWO DISTINCT PAPERS,

each perfect in itself. No other newspaper is made upon this plan.

The secular sheet contains a full report of all the news of the day, together with correspondence, editorials on every, and press; an AGRICULTURAL page, carefully edited, and containing practical matter; a COMMERCIAL page, edited by a gentleman distinguished for his accurate knowledge of the financial world; carefully prepared reports of the money, produce and cattle markets, bank statistics, &c.; a MISCELLANEOUS page, containing the scientific, literary and artistic matter, with tales, anecdotes, biography, travels, sketches and answers, for the instruction and amusement of the family and social circle.

The religious paper is filled with the choicest original and selected matter in every department of Christian literature, including sermons, addresses, Sabbath exposition, and furnishing a volume of interesting and valuable reading every week. The best and most accomplished clergymen, Presidents and Professors in our colleges and seminaries, constantly contribute to its pages. One of its chief features of attraction is a summary of intelligence from a feature peculiar to the Observer, and highly valued by Christians who wish to know what is going in other branches of the church.

ALL RELIGIOUS DENOMINATIONS;

The grand object of the NEW YORK OBSERVER is to present, in a form attractive to old and young, for the fire side and the counting house, all those principles which make the Union of the States a blessing to the commonwealth; it endeavors to promote the well being among all denominations of Christians; and is a faithful defender of the rights of all men, under the Constitution of the United States and Word of God.

In its editorial discussions, its reports and domestic correspondence, the vigor and beauty of its original contributions, and the attractions of its several departments in science, literature, art, agriculture and commerce, the NEW YORK OBSERVER is determined not to be surpassed by any newspaper.

Reliable correspondents in Church and State, promoting interests of pure religion and every substantial moral reform, on scriptural and rational principles, and opposing all infidelity, heathenism, fanaticism, and every schemes of infidelity, socialism and vice, the NEW YORK OBSERVER hopes to be a safeguard of virtue and law and order, a champion of truth and righteousness in all its work.

It is the cheapest newspaper of its class that is published. Each of the secular and religious papers are sent for two dollars and fifty cents, in advance. Two families can have the paper for four dollars. Any one can form a club and have a paper for $2 50.

Reliable persons wanted in Church and State, promoting interests of pure religion and every substantial moral reform, on scriptural and rational principles, and opposing all infidelity, socialism, fanaticism, and every science of infidelity, socialism and vice, the NEW YORK OBSERVER hopes to be a safeguard of virtue and law and order, a champion of truth and righteousness in all its work.

It is the cheapest newspaper of its class that is published. Each of the secular and religious papers are sent for two dollars and fifty cents, in advance. Two families can have the paper for four dollars. Any one can form a club and have a paper for $2 50.

Reliable persons wanted in SOLICITING SUBSCRIBERS. For such a service as procuring subscribers for us, we will pay the following liberal commissions: For every subscriber, paying in advance, for one year, but not more than five and less than ten, 75 cents each; for ten or more, $1 each. We will send a copy of our Illustrated, with control-maps, on paper of large size and best quality to each new subscriber, on receipt of the first number and payment for one year.

If you can not give personal attention to this work, will you show this advertisement to some energetic or worthy person who will take an interest in it, or to some one to whom the publishers mentioned above?

We will send specimen numbers without charge.

Your early attention is solicited to this subject, and we shall be happy to hear from you immediately, as we desire to offer the paper at once to every family in the United States. SIDNEY E. MORSE, Jr., & Co.,
Editors and Proprietors, No. 37 Park Row, New York.

"MEDICAL COMMON SENSE."

Send to the author and get the COMMON SENSE of this popular new work. Sent free to any part of the United States. Address Dr. S. S. FOOTE, 346 Broadway, New York.

The Completion of Alison's History of Europe.

HARPER & BROTHERS, Franklin Square, N. Y.,

Publish this Day:

The 9th and Concluding Volume of

ALISON'S History of Europe.

FIRST SERIES: From the Commencement of the French Revolution in 1789 to the Restoration of the Bourbons in 1815. 4 vols. 8vo. Muslin, $6 00; Sheep extra, $7 00; Half Calf, $10 00.

SECOND SERIES: From the Fall of Napoleon in 1815 to the Accession of Louis Napoleon in 1852. 4 vols. 8vo. Muslin, $6 00; Sheep extra, $7 00; Half Calf, $10 00.

☞ The Work Complete in 8 vols. Muslin, $12 00; Sheep extra, $14 00; Half Calf, $20 00.

☞ Sent by mail, postage free, to any part of the United States.

"The merits of Sir Archibald Alison as a historian need only be commented on in order to call attention to this important work. He brings industry, high culture, methodical perseverance, an active and eloquent mind, and rare powers of description, to the accomplishment of a task which can be evidently taken a cordial delight. Viewing his work as an elaborate digest of the events of his age, accompanied with frequent vivid and expressive portraitures of conspicuous scenes, it must be regarded as a valuable contribution to our literature and to history, and as an indispensable aid to the studies of every intelligent reader."

From the NEW YORK COURIER AND INQUIRER, May 27, 1859.

"Peruvian Syrup—A distinct patent Medicines most persons are justly prejudiced. Health is too valuable to be trifled with, and no one possessing ordinary prudence or sense would wish to take a patent medicine of which he knew nothing, except what is asserted by the maker of it. A person who is sick wants to know, may be all errant rogue. The Peruvian Syrup is not a patent medicine in any sense of the word. Every one believes that Heaven is no gentleman in it. It is a solution of the principles of iron, prepared by a scientific method. The properties are well known to Boston, and are gentlemen upon whose statements the utmost reliance can be placed. They do not claim that the syrup is a panacea, but that in all cases of debility arising from a loss of iron in the blood it will be found most efficacious. The diseases in which iron is prescribed by physicians are many, though this remedy is regarded as one of the most useful in the pharmacopœia. Where the blood is poor and impure, as is usual, for the consumptive, it is sometimes difficult to find in what form it should be administered. On the one hand the assertion that the Peruvian Syrup is a safe, pure and reliable with the blood in the form of protoxide, and on the other that it contains no alcohol to produce such unnecessary labor. The protoxide, we have, is said to be a very unstable compound, and liable to be converted into another form by the absorption of oxygen from the air. It is claimed that in the Peruvian Syrup it is so combined by chemical ingenuity as to remain unchanged in any climate. Sold by druggists."

Complete containing numerous certificates of cures from persons well known in this city, and also, can be had on application to the Agents,

BARRY, CLARK & CO., Proprietors,
No. 8 Gold Street, New York.
Sold by Druggists generally in the United States.

HARPER & BROTHERS,
257 to 265 Pearl Street (Franklin Square), New York,

Publish this Week:

I.

RAINBOWS JOURNEY.

Being the Second Volume of

Stories of Rainbow and Lucky,

By J. T. TROWBRIDGE.

BEAUTIFULLY ILLUSTRATED.

16mo. Muslin, 63 cents.

"HANDS" and "RAINBOW'S JOURNEY" now ready.

II.

HARRY'S SUMMER IN ASHCROFT.

ILLUSTRATIONS.

Square 4to, Muslin, 50 cents.

The author has endeavored to unite amusement with instruction. He has aimed to show his young readers how to observe and what to observe, and thus to give them a natural and genuine interest in, and understanding of, the wide and beautiful world around them.

Believing that he has accomplished this purpose, the Publishers confidently recommend the book to parents as a delightful companion to guide their children in the acquisition of valuable lessons.

Ayer's Cathartic Pills,

FOR ALL THE PURPOSES OF A

FAMILY PHYSIC,

are so compound that disease within the range of their action can rarely withstand or evade them. Their penetrating properties search, and cleanse, and invigorate every portion of the system, dislodging and removing the diseased action, and restoring its healthy vitalities. As a consequence of these properties, the invalid who is bowed down with pain or physical debility is astonished to find his burden or energy relieved by a remedy at once so simple and inviting.

Not only do they cure the every-day complaints of everybody, but they assail more formidable and dangerous diseases; such as Costiveness, Jaundice, Dyspepsia, Indigestion, Dysentery, Foul Stomach, Erysipelas, Rheumatism, Piles, Rheumatism, Eruptions and Skin Diseases, Ulcer Complaints, Dropsy, Tetter, Tumors and Salt Rheum, Worms, Gout, Neuralgia, as a Dinner Pill, and for Purifying the Blood.

They are sugar-coated, so that the most sensitive can take them pleasantly, and they are the best aperients in the world for all the purposes of a family physic.

Price 25 cents per Box; Five Boxes for $1 00.

PREPARED BY

DR. J. C. AYER & CO.,
LOWELL, MASS.

Sold by all Druggists everywhere.

IF WHISKERS AND MUSTACHES won't grow upon your face, use my original preparation (established 1835), which will force them to grow six weeks from the first application, and without stain or injury to the skin. Price $1, by mail, post-free, for any address. R. G. GRAHAM, 106 Nassau Street, New York.

Mother Goose For Grown Folks.
A NEW CHRISTMAS BOOK.

One volume, with Frontispiece by Billings, elegantly printed on tinted paper. Price, bound in Muslin, 75 cents.

☞ Sold everywhere, and sent by mail, postage free, on receipt of the price, by BUDD & CARLETON, 130 Grand Street, New York.

32. HEALTH OF AMERICAN WOMEN. 32.

It has often been a sad reflection that the physiological economy of women has rendered her liable to suffering and disease, for which a suitable remedy has never been found in the regular medical profession. Such mothers of a family, and most females above 18 years of age, fully experience this. Many partial, painful, and exhausting feats offer no exemption to this rule. So universal are these sufferings of women from 18 to 45, that it is safe to say every one is interested in obtaining certain relief.

DR. CHEESEMAN'S CELEBRATED FEMALE PILLS have been used in private practice for the common lot of women during the largest portion of the last 30 years.

The experience of many years, the serious ills of investigation by scientific medical men, the use of the medicines in the private circle and in the families of physicians, and its general use in the families of clergymen and all among the most enlightened and refined in the country, has resulted in arranging the elegant and well-known preparation of the Graefenberg Company as the only reliable remedy ever known for the universal and unfailing relief of females.

It is prepared by an educated physician of great experience, and it will be found to be a kind friend and a safe remedies ever known. Full directions for using accompany MARSHALL'S GENUINE GRAEFENBERG PILLS.

Price, $1 50 per bottle. ☞ FOR SIX DOLLARS FIVE BOTTLES ARE SENT BY EXPRESS, AND CHARGES PREPAID TO ANY OF EXPRESS LINE FROM NEW YORK. 32.

Address JOSHUA F. HOWARD, M.D., Secretary Consulting Physicians, Graefenberg Company, No. 32 FARR. ROW, NEW YORK. 32.

All of the Graefenberg medicines may be confidently relied on. They have been before the public for 12 years, and in that time have become a part of the regular practice of almost every physician in this country and climate.

I hereby certify that I have been a practicing physician of Steamboats established to me by the Graefenberg Company, relative to the merits of their medicines, and it is with pleasure in saying that they present evidence of genuineness and efficacy unequalled by any medicines now before the public. N. BANGS, D.D., of the Methodist Church.

Having examined certificates of the Graefenberg Company, of cases of long standing, that they present evidence of genuineness, and are entitled to the confidence of the public. WM. CHEESEMAN, Secretary of the Board of Health. The Graefenberg Company justifies me in expressing the opinion that their medicines are worthy the confidence of the public.

Editor and Proprietor New York Commercial Advertiser.

☞ The principles and practice of medicine adopted by the Medical Faculty of the Graefenberg Institution are clearly set forth in THE GRAEFENBERG MANUAL OF Health and Family Medicine, a work published for Family Use, and elegantly embellished with colored engravings of the Human Body, Male and Female. A copy of which it is mailed is now part of the country, free of postage.

DR. J. F. BISBEE may be consulted at the office of the Company, No. 32 Farr Row. Office hours, 9 to 1 and 3 to 4.

Ladd, Webster & Co.,
INVITE ATTENTION TO THEIR
IMPROVED TIGHT-STITCH
Sewing Machines,
WHICH FOR BEAUTY AND SIMPLICITY OF CONSTRUCTION, AND SPEED AND WORKING,
ARE UNEQUALED BY ANY.
650 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.
17 SUTHSTICK STREET, BOSTON.
620 CHESTNUT STREET, PHILADELPHIA.
202 BALTIMORE STREET, BALTIMORE.
80 WEST FOURTH STREET, CINCINNATI.

THE ORIGINAL BRIDGEWATER
PAINT OF NEW JERSEY, Established 1850,
For Roofs, Fences, Barns, Houses, Iron, Bricks, Canvas, Muslin, &c., dries readily, forming a metallic coat, spark and fire proof, durable and economical. Depot 72 Maiden Lane, New York.
BRICKS & BETTS, Agents.

☞ Every Number of HARPER'S MAGAZINE contains from 95 to 96 pages of reading matter, and in one half-more reading than any other in the country.

HARPER'S NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE,

NUMBER CXCVI.] CONTENTS. [JANUARY, 1860.

HOLIDAYS IN COSTA RICA.—II. SAN JOSE. By Bayard Taylor.
Illustrated by Eastman Engravings.
A LAY OF THE LAST CAVALIER.
STRAY THOUGHTS. Drawn by Fenta Carlen.
Illustrated by Eight Engravings.
SISTER TOM AND THE CONVENT.
Illustrated by Seventeen Engravings.
MRS. ANTHONY'S CHRISTMAS PRESENT.
THE POET'S SECRET.
THE ATOMS OF CHLADNI.
CARLSBAD OR CHARLESTON. By "Harry Gringo."
MISS VINTON OF TALLAHASSEE.
ROUNDY TURBOT.
HOW THE SNOW MELTED ON MOUNT WASHington.
THE THREE GREAT VOYAGES.
THE LAST DAYS OF COLIGNY.—A BALLAD OF LOUISIANA.
TURF, OUTDOOR STORIES IN ONE.
A CHRISTMAS HYMN.
MONTHLY RECORD OF CURRENT EVENTS.
LITERARY NOTICES.
EDITOR'S TABLE.
EDITOR'S EASY CHAIR.
EDITOR'S DRAWER.
HARPER'S WEEKLY and HARPER'S MAGAZINE, together, one year, $4 00.
☞ "HARPER'S MAGAZINE" must be paid at the Office where it is mailed. Terms, Postage in Clergy-ms Gratis. Address
HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers.

THE REAL "IRREPRESSIBLE CONFLICT."

[SEE CONGRESSIONAL DEBATES.]

G. M. BODINE,
481 Broadway,
1,000 PIECES
RICH SILKS,
ONLY 15 CENTS PER YARD.
VALUE $1 25.

G. M. BODINE,
481 Broadway,
3,000 FRENCH WORKED COLLARS,
AT FIFTY CENTS,
VALUE $1.

G. M. BODINE,
481 Broadway,
1,000 DOZEN
LADIES' HEMSTITCHED HANDKERCHIEFS,
AT $2 25 PER DOZEN,
WORTH $4.

G. M. BODINE,
481 Broadway,
1,000 DOZEN
LADIES' HEMSTITCHED HANDKERCHIEFS,
AT $3 PER DOZEN,
WORTH $6.

G. M. BODINE,
481 Broadway,
1,000 PIECES
RICH SILKS, EXTRA QUALITY,
AT $1 PER YARD,
REDUCED FROM $1 75.

TEACHERS OF DRAWING AND PAINTING,

And other fine arts, will find in the new book, ART SECTIONS, just published, valuable aid in all old styles and guide to new arts. It teaches Drawing, Oil and Water Painting, Sketching from Nature, Sketching, Analysis, Grecian, Oriental, Sign, Theorem and Fancy Wax, Wax Work, Hair Work, Leather Work, Gilding, Etching, Photochromatic, Paper Mache, Feather Flowers, Magic Lantern, Paper Flowers, Panorama Painting, Enamel Painting, Coloring Photographs in Oil and Water Colors, and many other valuable arts.
Elegantly Illustrated and handsomely bound.
Price.....$1 50
Rich, full gilt.....2 00
Turkey antique.....2 50
J. E. TILTON & CO., Boston, Publishers.

J. E. T. & Co. supply Seminaries, Schools, &c., with all Artists' goods. Send for circular of Prices, &c.

DR. J. B. MARCHISI'S
Celebrated Nerine Catholicon,
For the Relief and Cure of Suffering Females.

Climate and the normal habits of female life superinduce many functional derangements, which require timely counteract and cure. It can be relied upon in every case of Painful, Suppressed, or Irregular Menstruation. Prof. Ingalls Uhrt, Lecturer, Chicago: WEEKS & POTTER, Boston; or UNITED DRUG & CO., Pitts'd.
J. B. MARCHISI, M.D., Utica, N. Y.

Overcoats—$2 50, $4 50, $6 50, $8 50, $10 and $12.
Business Coats—$3 50, $4 50, $5 50, $6 50 & $10.
PANTS and VESTS—Of every Grade and Variety.
Goods, at GEO. A. HUNTER & CO.'s
Manhattan Clothing Store,
Nos. 290 and 292 Bowery.

THE HOLIDAYS AT HAND.

D. W. Evans & Co.,

The Pioneer Gift Book Store,

No. 677 Broadway, N. Y.

The Oldest Established GIFT-BOOK HOUSE.

A GIFT WITH EVERY BOOK.
Worth from 50 cts. to $100.

GIFTS,
For Christmas and New Years.

Elegantly bound and illustrated works, the largest selection ever offered for sale, are now on exhibition at the Pioneer Gift Book Store.

Holiday Catalogues

are now ready, in 16mo form, published expressly for the Holiday trade, containing full descriptions of every work of elegance and art, and of all the popular juvenile works of the season. They will be sent to purchasers gratis to all on application. Remember that in purchasing of us all books are sold at the regular rates, aside from which, without extra charge, an elegant present accompanies every purchase, at the time of sale, often a hundred fold for the original investment.

Persons residing at a distance from the city can be furnished with Catalogues on application, and may rely on having their orders filled faithfully and as impartially as at the store in New York.

Books.

By constant additions to our stock we have collected the largest and most varied selection of Books ever offered by any publishing house in the country, all of which are fresh from the publishers' hands, and are warranted perfect in every form.

A New Catalogue

of seventy-two octavo pages is now ready for gratuitous distribution, and will be mailed to any one address. For perfection of arrangement, facility in selection and identification of American and Modern Literature, it has never been equaled, and is considered by competent judges the most comprehensive index to general literature ever issued from the press. Do not forget that it is to any address. By constant additions to our stock, we have collected the largest and most varied selection of Books ever offered by any publishing house in the country. All of which may be found in every department of Literature.

Mailed Free

Send for a Catalogue.

It will be mailed free to any address, and will prove an invaluable assistant in the formation of a library, or the selection of useful and entertaining reading.

Dispatch.

Those who regard a prompt reply to their orders will be sure and send us their patronage, as the central location of New York City, with its many diverging means of transportation, gives us unrivaled advantages in forwarding to the most distant points. The business arrangements of our Establishment have been so thoroughly perfected that orders received by the evening mail the next morning are on their way to their destination, and no orders are delayed over twenty-four hours from the time of their reception.

SAFETY.

We take the risk of all loss through the mail, if the directions are followed as in Catalogue. Money sent in the form of draft payable to our order, or letters inclosing funds, if registered according to law, are insured a safe return.

AGENTS.

Take Notice, all who desire Profitable Employment.

We employ authorized Agents, thus offering a guaranty of fair dealing, and a proper attention to the interests of our patrons. Since the commencement of the year we have been rapidly appointing Local Agents, giving easy and lucrative employment to thousands of people.

Ten Thousand Agencies are open for application, and all persons desiring a pleasant, easy and profitable employment, requiring but little time, will do well to accept the earliest opportunity, and send in their names.

The superior advantages offered by us to book-buyers, as well as the fact that we have been longer established than any other Gift Book House, has induced the press to confer upon our business the title of

The Pioneer Gift-Book Store.

As we have from the first taken the lead of all others, we should endeavor to maintain our position as heretofore.

Book Agents and those desiring to become so should examine our terms, as ten books can be sold in the same time that one may be disposed of in the regular way, through the inducements given by us to the purchaser.

Remember

That we have taken the risk of loss through the mail. This is the only Gift Book House that has received the voluntary indorsement of over five hundred city and country papers, and of the leading publishing houses of the country.

This is the oldest establishment and most extensive house of the kind in the world.

We pay the most liberal commission to Agents.

We keep the most varied and extensive stock of Books and Gifts, and gratuitously articulate the most complete and best arranged catalogue in the country.

We guarantee perfect satisfaction to all who may favor us with their patronage.

One trial will satisfy the most irredulous. Send for Catalogue: it contains a description, and the cost, binding, and price of every book, in its pages, so that the selection can be precisely what is desired, and cannot be secured by receiving the full value of the investment in the Books, Gifts, & Gift varying in value from 50 cents to $100.

How to Send for Books.

Orders of Five Books and upward should be sent by express, if possible, as it is safer and cheaper than by mail.

Money, if possible, should be sent in form of Draft, as payment can be stopped if lost through the mail.

Letters inclosing money may be sent at our risk, provided it is inclosed in presence of the Postmaster, and registered according to law. These precautions are simple, and will secure the safe transmission of the largest sums of Books.

In ordering Books, the title, in black letters only, should be used. The writing should be plain, and the Name, Post Office, County, and State should be distinct, to avoid mistakes.

All book-readers will not fail to

Send for a Catalogue.

It will cost nothing, as it is mailed free of charge to all parts of the world. Direct all communications to

D. W. EVANS & CO.,
No. 677 Broadway, New York City.

Two Good Articles.
Only 12 Cents each.
Sold by Druggists Everywhere.

The Shilling Hair Tonic.

The Shilling Benzine.

For removing grease stains from Cloth or Silk; bathing with great facility, and giving perfect satisfaction.

Wholesale Depot, 359 Water Street, New York.

NEW GIFT BOOK HOUSE.

The Subscribers have commenced the Sale of Books on the Gift Principle, and hope that by offering extra inducements to receive a share of patronage. We offer the richest collection of Gifts to be found at any establishment, and the most extensive assortment of Books ever sent to any address.

WM. A. WILLIAMS & CO. (Park Block),
No. 81 Park Row and 145 Nassau Street,
New York.

WARM CLOTHING.

We now offer large assortments of Full and Winter Clothing, just manufactured, in our best styles, consisting in part of

ESQUIMAUX BEAVERS,
MOSCOW BEAVERS,
ELDER DOWN BEAVERS,
MAGENTA BEAVERS,
PRESIDENT BEAVERS,
CLARENDON BEAVERS,
DREADNAUGHT BEAVERS.

Also, complete suits of all styles of CASSIMERE and Beaver suits, and all the late styles Velvet and Cashmere Vestings, &c., &c.

BOYS' CLOTHING
AND FURNISHING GOODS
in great variety, at the lowest prices of trade.
WM. H. HORNE & CO.,
Nos. 258, 260, and 262 Broadway.

HOLIDAY PRESENTS.

Fine London Watches.

For Scientific Purposes,
Or for Pocket Time-Pieces.
RICH DIAMOND JEWELRY,
Bracelets—Earrings,
Brooches—Studs, &c., &c.
— SOLID GOLD CHAINS. —

At the Factory Prices,
25 per cent. below
Retail Store Prices.
D. C. PEACOCK, LONDON,
Represented by

DAVID RAIT,
405 Broadway,
UP STAIRS.

A New Picture for the Stereoscope!!
"GOOD FOR A COLD."

Just received by the Persia, a choice Assortment of comic New Views—Groups, Landscapes, &c., &c., and at greatly reduced prices, at the New York Depot of the LONDON STEREOSCOPIC CO.,
534 Broadway.

Special Announcement
FROM THE
Quaker City Publishing House!

100,000 Catalogues,
NEW, ENLARGED AND REVISED—NOW READY FOR DISTRIBUTION.

Superior Inducements to the Public!

A new and more plan for obtaining GOLD and SILVER WATCHES, and other valuable Prizes. Full particulars given in Catalogue, which will be sent free to all upon application.

Valuable Gifts, worth from 50 cents to $100, GUARANTEED to each purchaser. $100,000 in Gifts have been distributed to my patrons within the past six months—$50,000 to be distributed during the next six months.

The inducements offered Agents are more liberal than those of any other house in the business.

Having been in the Publishing and Bookselling business for the last eight years, my experience enables me to conduct the Enterprise with the greatest satisfaction to all.

AGENTS WANTED in every Town and County. For full particulars address DUANE JULLISON,
Quaker City Publishing House,
33 South Third Street,
Philadelphia, Pa.

The Wheeler & Wilson Sewing Machine Company,
Office 505 Broadway, New York,

Has prepared tables showing the actual experiment of four different workers, the time required to stitch each part of a garment by hand, and with their Sewing Machine. The result of the work done by the Machine, and the beatitudines of the employment, are advantages quite as great as the saving of time. Subjoined is a summary of several of the tables—

	BY MACHINE.		BY HAND.
Gentlemen's Shirts.....	Hours. 1	Min. 5	Hours. 13	Min. 31
Frock Coats.....	2	59	16	25
Satin Vests.....	1	14	7	39
Linen "		43	6	14
Cloth Pants.....		44	5	19
Summer Pants.....		33	3	50
Silk Dress.....	1	13	10	29
Merino Dress.....	1	4	9	27
Calico Dress.....		57	6	57

Seams of any considerable length are stitched ordinarily at the rate of a yard a minute.

PRINCE IMPERIAL CHAMPAGNE,

FROM DEVENOGE & CO EPERNAY, FRANCE.

A WINE of rare quality, at a moderate price. Sold at the PRINCIPAL HOTELS, and by ALL THE LEADING DEALERS throughout the country.

E. V. HAUGHWOUT, Sole Importer,
488, 490, and 492 Broadway,
corner of Broome Street, N. Y.

CHRISTMAS SUPPLEMENT TO

HARPER'S WEEKLY

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION

PRICE SIX CENTS.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, DECEMBER 24, 1859. [PRICE SIX CENTS.

Entered according to Act of the Year 1859, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

ANOTHER NEW SERIAL.

We shall shortly commence the publication, in Harper's Weekly, of a new Serial Story, of American Life, by an eminent American author. This story will be illustrated by JOHN MCLENAN, Esq.

We commenced in No. 152 the publication of a new Serial Story by WILKIE COLLINS, Esq., entitled

"THE WOMAN IN WHITE;"

which is illustrated expressly for this journal by JOHN MCLENAN, Esq.

The publication of the delicious Story of AMERICAN LIFE,

"TRUMPS,"

by GEORGE W. CURTIS, Esq., with HOPPIN'S Illustrations, was commenced in No. 119 of Harper's Weekly.

As Harper's Weekly is electrotyped, we can supply the back numbers from the commencement to any person who sends us the money.

Our Christmas Story.

THE HAUNTED HOUSES.

TO WIT:

The Mortals in the House. BY CHARLES DICKENS.

The Ghost in the Clock Room. BY MISS BESSIA STRETTON.

The Ghost in the Double Room. BY AUGUSTUS SALA.

The Ghost in the Picture Room. BY MISS E. PRESCOTT.

The Ghost in the Cupboard Room. BY WILKIE COLLINS.

The Ghost in Master B.'s Room. BY CHARLES DICKENS.

The Ghost in the Garden Room. BY MRS. GASKELL.

The Ghost in the Corner Room. BY CHARLES DICKENS.

THE MORTALS IN THE HOUSE.

BY CHARLES DICKENS.

UPON none of the accredited ghostly circumstances, and unvarnished by none of the conventional ghostly surroundings, did I first make acquaintance with the house which is the subject of this Christmas piece. I saw it in the daylight, with the sun upon it. There was no wind, no rain, no lightning, no thunder, no awful or unwonted circumstance, of any kind, to heighten its effect. More than that: I had come to it direct from a railway station; it was not more than a mile distant from the railway station; and, as I stood outside the house, looking back upon the way I had come, I could see the goods train running smoothly along the embankment in the valley. I will not say that every thing was utterly common place, because I doubt if any thing can be that, except to utterly commonplace people—and there my vanity steps in; but I will take it on myself to say that any body might see the house as I saw it, any fine autumn morning.

The manner of my lighting on it was this.

I was traveling toward London out of the North, intending to stop by the way, to look at the house. My health required a temporary residence in the country, and a friend of mine who knew that, and who had happened to drive past the house, had written to me to suggest it as likely to do. I had got into the train at midnight, and had fallen asleep, and had woke up and had looking out of window at the brilliant Northern Lights in the sky, and had fallen asleep again, and had woke up again to find the night gone, with the usual discontented conviction on me that I hadn't been to sleep at all; upon which question, in the first imbecility of that condition, I am ashamed to believe that I would have done wager by battle with the man who sat opposite me. That opposite man had had, through the night—as that opposite man always has—several legs too many, and all of them too long. In addition to this unreasonable conduct (which was only to be expected of him), he had had a pencil and a pocket-book, and had been perpetually listening and taking notes. It had appeared to me that three separate times I was roused to the jolts and bumps of the carriage, and I should have reigned myself if to his taking them, under a general supposition that he was in the civil engineering way of life, if he had not sat staring straight over my head wherever he listened. He was a gaggle-eyed gentleman of a perplexed aspect, and his demeanor became unbearable.

It was a cold, dead morning (the sun not being up yet), and when I had outwalked the paling lights of the fires of the iron country, and the curtain of heavy smoke that hung at once between me and the stars, and between me and the day, I turned to my fellow-traveler and said:

"I beg your pardon, sir, but do you observe any thing particular in me?" For, really, he appeared to be taking down either my traveling cap or my head with a minuteness that was a liberty.

The goggle-eyed gentleman withdrew his eyes from behind me, as if the head of the carriage was a haunted tree off, and said, with a lofty look of compassion for my insignificance:

"I? Oh, no."

"B, sir?" said I, growing warm.

"I have nothing to do with you, sir," returned the gentleman; "pray let me listen—O."

He enunciated this vowel after a pause, and noted it down.

At first I was alarmed, for an Express lunatic and no communication with the guard, is a serious position. The thought came to my relief that the gentleman might be what is popularly called a Rapper, and of a sort that, in exact proportion to the highest respect, bet whom I don't believe in. I was going to ask him the question, when he took the bread out of my mouth.

"You will excuse me," said the gentleman, continuing to look at the sky with an air/aspect of common humanity to trouble myself at all about it. I have passed the night—as I dare say you have a whole of my time now—in spiritual intercourse."

"Oh!" said I, something snappishly.

"The communications of the Spirits," continued the gentleman, turning several leaves of his note-book, "are of this message: 'Evil communications corrupt good manners.'"

"Sound," said I; "but, absolutely new?"

"Now then again," returned the gentleman.

I could only repeat my rather snappish "Oh!" and ask if I might be favored with the last communication?

"A bird in the hand," said the gentleman, reading his last entry with great solemnity, "is worth two in the Bush."

"Truly I am of the same opinion," said I; "but shouldn't it be Bush?"

"It came to me Bush," returned the gentleman. "The gentleman that influenced me that the spirit of Socrates had delivered this special revelation in the course of the night. 'My friend, I hope you are pretty well. There are two in this railway carriage. How do you do?' There are seventeen thousand one hundred and seventy-one spirits here, but you can not see them. Pythagoras is here. He is very desirous to mention it, but always was like traveling." Galileo likewise had dropped in, with this scientific intelligence. "I am glad to see you, Galileo. Come and Watt will freeze when it is cold enough. Addio!" In the course of the night, also, the following phenomena had occurred. Bishop Butler had insisted on spelling his name, "Bubler," for which offense against orthography and good manners he had been dismissed as out of temper. John Milton (suspected of wilfully mystificating) had repudiated the authorship of Paradise Lost, and had introduced, as joint authors of that poem, two Unknown Gentlemen, of whom nothing was known, but Sadgingtone. And Prince Arthur, nephew of King John, had declared that Shakespeare's having so tolerably comfortable in the seventh circle, where he was learning to paint on velvet, under the direction of Mary Queen of Scots.

If this should meet the eye of the gentleman who favored me with these disclosures, I trust he will excuse my confessing that the sight of the rising sun, and the contemplation of the magnificent Order of the vast Universe, made me impatient of them. In a word, I was so impatient of them, that I was mightily glad to get out at the next station, and to exchange these clouds and vapors for the free air of Heaven.

By that time it was a beautiful morning. As I walked away among such leaves as had already fallen from the golden, brown, and russet trees; and as I looked around me on the wonders of Creation, and thought of the steady, unchanging, and harmonious laws by which they are sustained; the gentleman's spiritual intercourses seemed to me as poor a piece of journey-work as ever this world saw, in which beastian state of mind I came within view of the house, and stopped to examine it attentively.

It was a solitary house, standing in a sadly neglected garden: a pretty even square of some two acres. It was a house of about the time of George the Second; as stiff, as cold, as formal, and in as bad taste, as could possibly be desired by the most loyal admirer of the whole quartette of Georges. It was uninhabited, and had, within a year or two, been cheaply repaired to render it habitable; I say cheaply, because the work had been done in a surface manner, and was already decaying as to the paint and plaster, though the colors were fresh. A lop-sided board dropped over the garden wall, announcing that it was "to let on very reasonable terms, well furnished." It was much too closely and busily shadowed by trees, and, in particular, there were six tall poplars before the front windows, which were excessively melancholic, and the site of which had been extremely ill chosen.

It was easy to see that it was an avoided house on a loose land that was shunned by the village, to which my eye was guided by a church spire some half a mile off—a house that nobody would take. And the natural inference was, that it had the reputation of being a haunted house.

Now, within the four-and-twenty hours of day and night is so solemn to me as the early morning, that this discovery gave me a chill even early, and repair to my room to do a day's work before breakfast, and I am always on those occasions put into possession of the whole forenoon and solitude around me. Besides that there is something sweet in the long-remembered, calm, pleasant face whose on the knowledge that those who are dearest to us, and to whom we are dearest, are profoundly unconscious of us, in an impassive state antiipative of that mysterious condition to which we are all tending—the longest life, the broken threads of yesterday, the deserted seat, the closed book, the unfinished but abandoned occupation, all are set free to me by the tranquility of the hour, the tranquility of Death. The color and the chill have been upon me from a child, from a certain air that familiar household objects take upon them when they first emerge from the shadows of the night into the morning, of being newer, and as they used to be long ago, has its counterpart in the appearance of the worn face of maturity or age, in death, into the old youthful look. Moreover, I once saw the apparition of my father at this hour, as I then believed, and well, and nothing ever came of it, but I saw him in the daylight, sitting with his back toward me, on a seat that stood beside my bed. His head was resting on his hand, and whether he was slumbering or grieving, I could not discern. Amazed to see him there, I sat up, moved my position, leaned out of bed, and looked round at him, but did not move, I spoke to him more than once. As he did not move then, I became alarmed, and laid my hand upon his shoulder, as I thought—but there was no such thing.

For all these reasons, and for others less easily explicable, perhaps, I had the early morning in my most ghostly time. Any house would be more or less haunted, to me, in the early morning; and a laundry house could scarcely address me in greater advantage than then.

I walked round the village, with the secretion of this house upon my mind, and I found the landlord of the little inn sending his door-step. I bespoke breakfast, and touched the subject of his house.

"Is it haunted?" I asked.

The landlord looked at me, shook his head, and answered, "I say nothing."

"Has it been haunted?"

"Well!" cried the landlord, in an outburst of fraudulent candor and appearance of desperation—"I wouldn't sleep in it."

"Why not?"

"If I wanted to have all the bells in a house ring, with nobody to ring 'em; and all the doors in a house bang, with nobody to bang 'em; and all sorts of feet treading about, with no feet there: why then," said the landlord, "I'd sleep in that house."

"Is any thing seen there?"

The landlord looked at me again, and then, with his former appearance of desperation, called down his stable-yard for "Boy!"

The call produced a high-shouldered young fellow, with a round, red face, a short crop of sandy hair, a very broad, humorous mouth, a turned-up nose, and a great sleeved waistcoat of purple bars with number of pearl buttons, that seemed to be growing upon him, and to be in a fair way—if it were not pruned—of covering his head and overturning that his boots.

"This gentleman wants to know," said the landlord, "if any thing's seen at the Poplars?"

"Ooded woman with a howl," said Boy, in a state of great freshness.

"Do you mean a cry?"

"I mean a bird, sir."

"A hooded woman with an owl. Dear me! Did you ever see her?"

"I seen the howl."

"Never the woman?"

"Not so plain as the howl, but they always keeps together."

"Has any body ever seen the woman as plainly as the owl?"

"Lord bless you, sir! Lots."

"Who?"

"Lord bless you, sir! Lots."

"The general-dealer opposite, for instance, who is opening his shop?"

"I thinks I does you, Perkins wouldn't go a-nigh the place. No?" observed the young man, with considerable firmness. "It ain't my'erwrite, ain't Perkins, but he on't such a fool as that."

Here the landlord murmured his confidence in Perkins's knowledge better?

"Who is—or who was—the hooded woman with the owl?" I inquired. "Do you know?"

"Well!" said Iksy, looking up his cap with one hand while he scratched his head with the other, "they say, in general, that she was murdered, and the howl he 'noted the while."

Not wishing to overwhelm any of the facts was all I could learn, except that a young man, as beauty and lately a young man at a very high desk, took with fits and held down in 'ons, after seeing the hooded woman. Also, that a personage dimly described as "a held chap, a sort of a one-eyed tramp, answering to the name of Joky, unless you should have his Christened, and then he said, 'Why not? and even if it, mind your own business,' had encountered the hooded woman, a matter of fifty years ago. But I was not materially assisted by these witnesses: inasmuch as the latter had left England, and the last was, as Iksy said (and he was confirmed by the landlord) Anywheres.

Now, although I regard with a hushed and solemn fear, the mysteries between which and this state of existence is interposed the barrier of the great trial and change that fell on all the things that live; and although I have not the audacity to pretend that I know any thing of them; I can no more reconcile the mere banging of doors, ringing of bells, opening of boards, and such-like insignificances, with the majestic beauty and pervading analogy of all the Divine rules that I am permitted to understand, than I had been rabbi, a little while before, to yoke the spiritual intercourse of my fellow-traveler to the chariot of the rising sun. Moreover, I had lived in two haunted houses—both abroad. In one of these, an old Italian palace, which bore the reputation of being very badly haunted indeed, and which had recently been actually squatted on that account, I lived eight months, most tranquilly and pleasantly: notwithstanding that the house had a score of mysterious bedrooms, which were never used, and possessed, in one large room in which I sat reading, times out of number at all hours, and next to which I slept, a haunted chamber of the first pretensions. I gently hinted these considerations to the landlord. And as to this particular house having a bad name, I reasoned with him, Why, how many houses and how many names authors have gone over it was to give bad names, and did he not think that if he and I were permitted to whisper in the village that any weird-looking old drunken tinker of the neighborhood had sold himself to the Devil, he could come in time to be suspected of that commercial venture! All this was talk was perfectly lost upon the landlord, I am bound to confess, and was as dead a failure as ever I made in my life.

To cut this part of the story short, I was pleased about the haunted house, and was already half resolved to take it. So, after breakfast, I went to keys from Perkins's brother-in-law (a very decent harness-maker, who keeps the Post-Office under existence is a most respectable way), and Doubly Seconding Little Emmanuel, I presently went up to the house, attended by a great following by Iksy.

Within, I found it, as I had expected, dismally damp. The bloom was on the walls of the ces it from the heavy trees, were decked in the last degree; the house was dilapidated, ill-kept, ill-planned, and ill-fitted. It was damp, it was not free from dry-rot, there was a flaver of rats in it, and it was the gloomy victim of that indescribable decay which settles on all the work of man's hands wherever it is not tented with human sustenance. The kitchens and offices were too large, and too remote from each other. Above stairs and below, were cracks of passage intervened between patches of fertility represented by rooms; and there was a monthly dirt well with a green pump in it, a big, big, like a murderous trap, near the bottom of the back-door, under the double row of eaves. Out of these bells was labelled, on a black ground in faded white letters, MASTER B. This, they told me, was the bell that rang the most.

"Who was Master B.?" I asked. "Is it known what he did while the owl hooted?"

"Rang the bell," said Dicey.

I was rather struck by the prompt dexterity with which this young man pitched his ear up at the bell, and rang it himself. It was a loud, unpleasant bell, and made a very disagreeable sound. The other bells were inscribed according to the names of the rooms to which their services were directed: as "Picture Room," "Double Room," "Clock Room," and the like. Following Master B.'s bell to its source, I found that young gentleman to have had but indifferent third-class accommodation in a triangular cabin under the roof, left, with a corner fire-place which Master B. must have been exceedingly small if he were ever able to warm himself at, and a corner diagonally opposite like a pyramidal staircase to the ceiling for Tom Thumb. The purpose of one side of the room had dropped down bodily, with fragments of plaster adhering to it, and almost blocked up the door. It appeared that Master B., in his spiritual condition, always made a point of pulling the paper down. But he had finished one little night's request why he made such a fool of himself.

Except that the house had an immensely large vaulted loft at top, it made no other discoveries. It was moderately well furnished, but sparely. Some of the furniture—say, a third—was as old as the house; the rest was of various periods within the last half century. I was referred to a cornechandler in the market-place of the county town to rest for the house. I went that day, and I took it for six months.

It was just the middle of October when I moved in with my maiden sister (I venture to call her eight-and-thirty, for I am eight-and-twenty myself, and easinging). We took with us a deaf stable-man, my bachelor friend Tuck, two session students, and a young person called an Odd Girl. I have reason to record of the attendant last enumerated, who was one of the Saint Lawrence Union Female Orphans, that she was a fatal mistake and a disastrous engagement.

The year was dying early, the leaves were falling fast, it was a raw cold day when we took possession, and the aspect of the house was more depressing. The cook (an amiable woman, but of a weak turn of intellect) burst into tears on beholding the kitchen, and requested that her silver watch might be delivered over to her sister (2 Tappitoch's Gardens, Diggory Walk, Clapham Rise), in the event of any thing happening to her from the damp. Strachan, the housemaid, feigned cheerfulness, but was the greater martyr. The Odd Girl, who had never been in the country, alone my sister excepted, made entertainment for sowing an acorn in the garden outside the scullery window, and rearing an oak.

We went, before dark, through all the natural —as opposed to supernatural—miseries incidental to our state. Dispiriting reports occurred (like the smoke) from the basement in volumes, and descended from the upper rooms. There was no pulling-pin, there was no salamander (which failed to surprise me, for I don't know what it is), there was nothing in the house—that there was, was broken—the last people must have lived like pigs. What could the meaning of the insides be? Through these dismtresses, the Odd Girl was cheerful and exemplary. But, within four hours after dark, we had got into a supernatural state, and the Odd Girl had seen "Eyes," and was in hysterics.

My sister and I had agreed to keep the haunting strictly to ourselves, and my impression was, and still is, that I had not left Dicey, when he helped to unload the cart, alone with the women, or any one of them, for one minute. Nevertheless, as I say, the Odd Girl had "seen Eyes" (no other explanation could ever be drawn from her), before nine, and by ten o'clock had had so many stronger applied to her as would pickle a handsome salmon.

I leave a discerning public to judge of my feelings, when, under these unexpected circumstances, at about half past ten o'clock, Master B.'s bell began to ring in a most [illegible] and balked the ringing, and if they could suppose that that confounded boy had lived and died, to that their confounded boy had better behavior than would unquestionably have brought him and the sharpest particles of a birch-broom into close acquaintance in the present imperfect state of existence, they could also suppose a mere poor human being, such as I was, capable by reason thereof of the means of considering and limiting the powers of the disembodied spirits of the dead, or of any body else. I had no such presumption, and I suggest, not to say rather complacent, in such an address, when it would all go for nothing with the Odd Girl, who, being already stiffening from the toes upward, and glaring among us like a parochial petrifaction.

Streaker, the house-maid, too, had an attribute of a most discomposing nature. I am not sure that Streaker was not the abnormally lymphatic temperament, or what else was the matter with her; but this young woman became in process of time, for the production of the largest and most transparent tears I ever saw. Combined with these, Streaker's circumstantiality was a peculiar tenacity of hold in those specimens, so that they didn't fall, but hung pump on her cheeks. Thus, in the present case, and mildly and deploringly shaking her head, her silence would declare more than any thing that Streaker's situation could have done in a verbal deputation for a pure of money. Cook likewise, in Dicey's overcome state of mind, was not to be silenced, by neatly winding up the session with the protest that the Ouse was evidently not to be relied upon for [illegible] wishes regarding her silver watch.

As to our nightly life, the contagion of suspicion and fear was among us, and we were not to escape from it by sunrise. The women (their noses in a chronic state of excoriation from smelling-salts) were in a state of exhaustion from hysterics, a swoon, and ready to go off with hair-triggers. The two elder declared the Odd Girl out of the question, as she was constantly bodily hazardous, and she always established the reputation of such adventures by coming back a principle. As the gentlemen were overhead after dark, we knew we should presently hear a spring on the premises, and we did hear it accordantly, that it was as if a fighting man were engaged to go about the house, administering a touch of the art, which we believed, with Patty's leave, to every domestic he met with.

It was a time for the thing. It was in vain to be frightened, for the moment in one's own person, by a real owl, and then to know it to be so; to be a Rhadamanthus with the bells, and if an unfortunate bell rang without leave, to have a more unpleasant bell to ring. It was in vain to fire up chimneys, let torches down the well, inspect forward premises, and search the cellars. We changed servants, and it was no better. The new set ran away, and a third set came, and it was no better. At last, one of the housekeeping set to be so disorganized and wretched, that I see night depicted there to my mother. Patty, I agree to despair of our getting people to go on with us here, and I think we must give this up."

My sister, who is a woman of immense spirit, replied, "No, John, don't give it up. Don't be afraid. We shall get used to it."

"And what is that?" said I.

"John," returned my sister, "if we are not to be driven out of the house, and that for no reason whatever, that is apparent to you or me, we must positively resolve to take the house wholly and solely into our own hands."

"But, the servants," said I.

"Have no servants," said my sister, boldly.

Like most people in any grade of life, I had never thought of the possibility of living in a house without faithful obstructions. The notion was so new to me when suggested that I looked very doubtful.

"We know what we have to be afraid of," said my sister, "and we know they are frightful. We know what we have to be afraid of, and we can therefore meet and defeat one another, and we know they are frightful and do injure one another." And my sister—

"With the exception of Bottles," I observed, in a meditative tone.

"The deaf stable-man. I kept him in my service, and still keep him, as a phenomenon of nonresonance not to be matched for [illegible]

"To be sure, John," assented my sister; "except Bottles. And what does that go to prove? Bottles is imperturbable, and hears nobody when he is absolutely roused at, and what alarm has Bottles ever given me or mine? None."

This was perfectly true; the individual in question having retired, every night at ten o'clock, to his bed over the coach-house, and "not" to hear any thing less than a pitchfork and a pail of water. That the pail of water would have to be drawn from the pitchfork through me, if I had put myself without announcement in Bottles's way after that retirement, I had no doubt; but it was not worth remembering. Neither had Bottles ever taken the least notice of any of our many uproars. In impenetrable and speechless man, he had sat at his supper at Streaker present in a swoon, and the Odd Girl mantle, and had only put another potato in his cheek, or pushed by the general misery to help himself to cat-sick pie.

"And so," continued my sister, "I except Bottles. And considering, John, that the house is to our use, and I shall spend our lonely, to it kept well in hand by Bottles, yes, and me, I propose that we cast about among our friends for a certain selected number of the most reliable and willing—such a Society here for three months—wait upon ourselves and one another—live cheerfully and socially—and see what happens."

I was so charmed with my sister, that I engaged her directly to me as my wife, and went into her plan with the greatest ardor.

We were then in the third week of November; and, we took our measures so vigorously, and with so well seconded by the friends in whom we consulted, that three days before the first of December we expired, when our party all came down together merrily, and mustered in the haunted house.

I will mention here, in the first place, two small changes that I made while my sister and I were yet alone. I arranged for me as not improbable that Turk bowled in the house at night, partly because he wanted to get out of it, I stationed him in his kennel outside, where, indeed, I and I certainly believed the village that any man who came in his way would not escape with less without a zip in his own throat. I then casually asked Dicey if he were a judge of a gun? On his saying, "Yes, sir, I have been used to them from a boy," I took a favor of his stepping up to the house and looking at mine.

"She's a true one, sir," said Dicey, after inspecting a double-barrelled rifle that I bought in New York "a fire years ago." "Do mistake about it, sir."

"Dicey," said I, "don't mention it; I have seen something in this house."

"No, sir?" he whispered, gredibly opening his eyes. "Real, sir? Ghost, sir?"

"Don't be frightened," said I. "It was a figure—something like you."

"Lord, sir?"

"Dicey" said I, shaking hands with him warmly, "I am not a superstitious man; I'll throw the truth in these ghost-stories, the greatest service I can do my fellow-creatures is to expose them. Let me see you, by Heaven and earth, I will do it with this gun if I see it again!"

The young man pondered me, and took his leave with some little precipitation, after declining a glass of brandy. I imparted my secret to him, because I had never quite forgotten his throwing his cap at the bell; because I had, on another occasion, observed something in him that I liked; because, far from the bell, one night when it had burst out ringing, and I had mounted to the top of the house at our gloomiest whenever he came up in the evening to comfort the servants. Let me do Dicey no injustice. He was fond of the house, and believed in its being haunted; and yet he would play Jack on the ringing bell, so surely as he got an opportunity. The Odd Girl's case was exactly similar. She went about the house in a state of vivid terror, and was constantly and audibly frightened, and invented many of the alarms she spread, and yet she was the most determined of the set. I see my eye on the two, and I know it. It is not necessary for me, here, to account for this preposterous state of things. It is enough for me to record that it is familiarly known to every intelligent observer in every walk of medical, legal, and watchful experience; that it is as well established and as common a state of mind as any with which observers are acquainted; and that it is one of the first elements, above all others, rationally to be suspected in, and carefully looked for, and separated from, any question of this kind.

To return to our party. The first thing we did when we were established was to draw to close the bedrooms. That done, and every bedroom, and, indeed, the whole house, having been minutely examined by the whole body, we proceeded to our household duties, as if we had been on a gipsy party, or a yachting party, or a hunting party, or were shipwrecked. I then recounted the floating rumors concerning the haunted lady, the owl, and Master B., which, still more fleecy, I had floated, had floated about during our occupation, relative to some wholesome mystery in the neighborhood who went up and down, carrying the ghost of a round table; and also to an inexplicable Jackass, whom nobody ever was able to catch. Some of these ideas I really believe our people below had communicated to one another in some incredible way, without conveying them in words. We then gravely called one another to witness, that we were not there to be imposed on by deceivers—that we considered pretty much the same thing—and that, with a solemn sense of our responsibility, we would strictly true to one another, and would strictly follow out the truth. The understanding was established, that every one should unusual noises in the night, and who wished to trace them, should knock at my door: lastly, that on Twelfth Night, the last night of holy Christmas, all our individual experiences since that then present hour of our meeting together in the haunted house, should be brought to light for the good of all; and that we should hold no keeps on anything till then, nor less on some remarkable provocation to break silence.

We were, in number and in character, as follows:

First—to get my sister and myself out of the way of others—me to [illegible] the drawing of lots, my sister drew her own room, and I drew Master B.'s. Next, there was our first cousin, John Herschel, to whom I had offer the Astronomer; this when I suppose a letter man at a telescope does not breathe. With him, we had invited a certain creature to whom he had been married in the previous spring. I thought it (under the circumstances) rather inexpedient to bring her, because there is no knowing what even a false alarm may do at such a time; but I suppose he knew his own business best, and I must say that if she had been my wife, I never could have left her endearing and bright face behind. They drew the Clock Room. Alfred Burbler, an uncommonly agreeable young fellow of eight-and-twenty for whom I have the greatest liking, was in the Double Room: mine, usually, and designated by that name from having a dressing-room within it, with two large and comfortable windows, which no wedges I was ever able to make, would keep from shaking. In any weather, wind or no wind. Alfred is a young fellow who pretends to be "fast" (another word for bose, as I understand the term), but who is much too good and sensible for that nonsense, and who would have distinguished himself before now, if his father had not unfortunately left him a small independence of two hundred a year, on the strength of which his only occupation in life has been to spend nine. Of this hopeful youth, Mr. Jarndyce Bankcr may break, or that he may enter into some speculation promised to pay twenty per cent, for; I am convinced that if he could only be ruined, his fortune is made. Belinda Bates, "dearest friend of my sister, and most intellectual young lady, and delightful girl, got the Picture Room. She has a most charming face, combined with the most business earnestness, and "goes in"—to use an expression of Alfred's—for Woman's mission. Woman's rights, Woman's wrongs, Woman's anything that is Woman's with a capital W, or is not and ought to be, or is and ought not to be. "Mere praiseworthy, my dear, and Heaven prosper you!" I whispered to her on the first night of my taking care of her at the Picture Room, and I don't think I overdo it. And in respect of the great necessity there is, by-the-by, for bracing her moral system daily within the reach of Woman than our civilization has as yet assigned to her, don't fly at the unfortunate man, whoever he was who ate of the wild in your way, as if they were the natural oppressors of your sex; for, trust me, Belinda, they sometimes spend their wages among wives and daughters, sisters, mothers, aunts, and grandmothers; and the pity is, really, that you and Bell Bolind-Heed, but each other parts in it." How-ever, I digress.

Belinda, as I have mentioned, occupied the Picture Room. We had but three other chambers: the Corner Room, the Cupboard Room, and the Garden Room. My old friend, Jack Governor, "clerk in the counting-house," as he calls it, the Corner Room. I have always regarded Jack as the finest-looking sailor that ever sailed. He is gray now, but in appearance he was a sportsman of a century ago—say, huntsman. A portly, cheery, rubicund figure of a human being, strong, with a frank smile, a brilliant dark eye, and a rich dark eyebrow. I remember those under darker hair, and they look to be better under the silver covering. He has been wherever his Union mansion-flag has flown, and I have met old shipmates of his, away in the Mediterranean and on the other side of the Atlantic, who have beamed and brightened at the casual mention of his name, and have cried, "You know Jack Governor? Then you know a trump!" That he is a trump I and no unmistakably a naval officer, that if you were to meet him coming out of an Esquimaux snowhut in coals of fire, you would say he had descended he was in full naval uniform.

Jack's one but that bright clear eye of his on my sister; but, it fell out that he married another lady and took her to South America, where she died. Jack was left a dozen years a widower. He brought down with him to our haunted house a little cask of rare Old Tom, which we conceived that all salt beef not of his own picking, is mere carrion, and invariably, when he goes to London, he puts a pint in his portmanteau. He had also volunteered to bring with him one "Nat Beaver," an old comrade of his, captain of a merchantman, Mr. Beaver, with a thick-set figure, a square face, and apparently as hard as a block all over, proved to be a most intelligent man of a world of watery experiences in him, and great practical knowledge. At times, there was a curious nervousness about him, apparently the lingering result of some old illness; but it seldom lasted many minutes. He got the Cupboard Room, and lay there next to Mr. Undery, my friend and solicitor: who came down, in an amateur capacity, "to see through the thing," he said, and to be plays whist better than the whole Law List put together, and cover at the beginning to the last verse at the end.

I was two happier in my life, and I believe that was the universal feeling among us. Jack Governor, always a man of wonderful resources, was Chief Cook, and he and Nat Beaver, and others if ever ate, including unapproachable curries. My sister was pastry-cook and confectioner. Starting that news Double Room, two small tables and, and on special occasions the chief cook "pressed" Mr. Beaver. We had a great deal of exercise, great and exercise, but nothing was neglected within, and there was no ill-humor or misunderstanding among us, but our evenings were delightful that we had at least one good reason for being reluctant to go to bed.

We had a few night alarms in the beginning. On the first night, I was knocked up by Jack with the most tremendous sailor's hammering, that, like the gills of some monster of the deep, who informed me that he was "going down for the third time," to have the weathercock down. It was a stormy night and I remonstrated; but Jack called my attention to its making a sound like a ship's bell—and said somebody would be "hailing a ghost" presently, if we knew any thing. Mr. Beaver then, swarmed up to the top of a cupola, some two dozen feet above the chimneys, and rose upon something particular, coolly knocking the weathercock off, until they both got into good spirits with the wind and the fun delight, that I thought they would never come down. Another night, they turned out again, and had a chimney-sweep. Another night, they cut a sobbing and gulping water-pipe away. Another night, they found out something else. On several occasions, they both, in the coolest manner, simultaneously dropped out of their respective bedroom windows, hand over hand by their counterpane, to "overhaul" something mysterious in the garden.

The engagement among us was faithfully kept, and nobody revealed any thing. All we knew, was, if any one's room was haunted, no one looked the worse for it. Christmas came, and we had no Sole Christmas fare ("all hands" had been prepared for the pudding), and Twelfth Night came, and our store of mince-meat was empire to hold out to the last day of our time, and our cake was quite a gloomy sight. It was then, as we all sat round the table and the fire, that I recited the terms of our compact, and called, first, for

THE GHOST IN THE CLOCK ROOM.

BY MISS HESBA STRETTON.

My cousin, John Herschel, turned rather red, and turned rather white, and said that he supposed that his room had been haunted. The Spirit of a woman had appeared in it. On being asked by several voices whether the Spirit had taken any terrible or ugly shape, my cousin drew his wife's arm through his own, and said shortly, "No." To the question, had his wife been aware of the Spirit? he answered, "Yes." Had it spoken? "Oh dear, yes!" As to the question, "What did it say?" he replied apologetically, that he could have wished he had not; that he would have undertaken to meet any one should have executed it much better than he. However, he had not the promise to be the mouth-piece of the Spirit, and was not aware that he should withhold nothing; so, he would do his best, always to her correction. "The message of the Spirit," added my cousin, as he finally prepared himself for beginning, "to be my wife here, sitting among us!"

I was an orphan from my infancy, with six elder half-sisters. A long and persistent course of training (some people call it by a harsher name) had diverse natures, and I grew up as much the child of my eldest sister, Barbara, as I was the daughter of my deceased parents.

Barbara, in all her private plans, as in all her domestic decrees, invariably decided that her sisters must be married; and, no powerful but sisters be single but inflexible will, that each of them had been advantageously settled, except myself, for upon whom she built her highest hopes.

Most people knew Barbara by words as I had grown—a mindless, flirting girl, whose acknowledged vocation was taunting and catching of an eligible match; rather pretty, lively, and with sentimental enough to make as a very pleasant companion for an idle hour or two, as I existed and enjoyed the slight attentions my sisters thought it pleased to offer. There was scarcely a young man in the neighborhood with whom I had not quoted. I had served my seven years' apprenticeship to my profession, and had passed my twentyfifth birthday without having achieved my purpose when Barbara's patience was wearied, and she spoke to me with a decision and explicitness not at all always avoided; for, on some subjects, it is better to have a silent understanding than an expressed opinion.

"Stella," she said, solemnly, "you are now five and twenty, and you are one of your sisters even to the wans, and, unless you exert yourself, one plain must fail. I have observed and noted with pain you have fallen, and which I have not mentioned before. Besides your very open and indiscriminate flirtations—which young men regard only as an amusing pastime—you have a way with you of relaying and laughing at any one who has proposed to you really serious. Now your opportunity rests upon the moment when they begin to be earnest in their manner. Then you should seem astonished and silenced; you ought to lose your vivacity, and half avoid them; seeming alarmed and agitated and quite bewildered by the change. A little melancholy goes a deal further than the utmost cheerfulness for, if a man believes you live with a broken heart, he will not give you a second thought. I could name half a dozen unexceptionable gentlemen who have lost by laughing at the wrong minute. Mortify a man's self-love, Stella, and you can never heal the wound."

I passed with a murmur of two better resources for the original suppressed nature that I had inherited from my unknown mother, and Barbara was wounted feeling in my heart.

"Barbara," I answered, with timidity, "among all the people I have known, I never saw one whom I could reverence and look up to; nor, I am half ashamed to say the word, whom I could love."

"I do not wonder you are ashamed," said Barbara, severely. "At your age, you can not expect to fall in love like a girl of seventeen. And if you, deliberately and distinctly, it is necessary that you should marry; or not love at all, which is a concert now. So, if you will decide upon any one, I will give every assistance in my power, and, if you will only encourage your rashest and oldest, you may succeed. Propriety is all you require, if you once make up your mind."

"I do not like any one I know," I replied, modestly; "and I have no chance with those who have known me, so I decide upon besieging Martin Fraser."

Barbara received this announcement with a sort of derisive anger.

The neighborhood in which we lived was a populous one district, where, though there were few families of ancient birth or high standing, there were a great many of our own, inhabiting a pleasant, hospitable, social class. Our residence were commodious modern houses, built at convenient distances from each other. Some of these, including our own, were the property of an infirm old man, who dwelt in his family mansion, the last of the many gabled, half-timbered Elizabethan houses which had stood upon the undiscovered land and coal fields. The last relics of the rural aristocracy of the district. Mr. Fraser and his son held a strictly exclusive life, evading all communication with their neighbors, whose cards and hospitality they could not reciprocate. No one intruded upon their privacy, excepting for the most necessary business transactions. The elder man was almost bedridden, and the younger was said to be entirely absorbed in scientific pursuits. No wonder that Barbara laughed; but her ridicule only excited and confirmed my determination; and the very difficulty of the enterprise gave it the interest that all my other efforts had lacked. I agreed alternately with Barbara till I won her consent.

"You must speak to old Mr. Fraser," I said. "Do not mention the young one, and say your youngest sister is studying astronomy, and, as he possesses the largest telescope in the county, he will be greatly indebted to him if he would let her look at it."

"There is one thing in your favor," Barbara remarked, as she prepared to write, "the old gentleman was once engaged to your mother."

Oh! I am humbled to think how slavishly we must bend ourselves and entreat a favor from the tion from Mr. Fraser to the "daughter of his old friend, Maria Linton."

It was an evening in February when, accompanied only by an old servant—for Barbara was not included in my plan—I was ushered across the threshold of Martin Fraser's home.

An air of profound repose pervaded the dwelling. I entered it with a vague, uneasy consciousness of smiliness and treachery. My attendant remained in the hall, unannounced, and, as I passed through to the library, a feeling of shyness stole over me, which was strangely unlike my usual self-reliance, a recollection that I was becomingly dressed, I regained my confidence, and advanced smilingly into the room. It was a low, oblong apartment, dimly lumber, with massive antique furniture that threw into still gloomier shadows against the dull, uncertain light of a fire, by which stood, instead of the recluse, Martin Fraser whom I expected to meet, a tall, stout, handsome man, with a florid complexion and with a woman's self-possession and ease of manner.

"I am very glad to see you. You are welcome," she said, advancing to meet me, and extending her hand. I looked down on it, and placed my hand with a firm and peculiar grasp: a chap of exclusive and peculiar habits could not endure many timidity or inertness of a child's manner, and, placing me in a chair before the fire, she seated herself opposite me.

I made a few embarrassed remarks, to which she replied, and, then, there was a pause, which I did not desire. A huge black retriever lay motionless at her feet, which rested upon him, covered with the fine, glossy hair. Beside them on the hearth-rug was an expression of placidity, slightly pensive, upon her lofty features, heightened by the peculiar habit of closing the eyes, which is rarely seen in children, and always gives them a statuesque appearance. Her dress was of black velvet, which drawn herself into a solitary self-consuming, of which they could not be ashamed, and which, as I saw on looks. I grew afraid of the silent, weird-like creature, sitting without apparent breath or motion in the dim firelight, and, as I did not wish to be her opened, and the object of my pursuit entered. I looked on him with curiosity. He was the first dog from my sense of treachery, and it amused me to think how unconscious he was of our dubious plan concerning him. He was a noble animal, and I must had a fear of being caught, greater than my desire to outwit him. He looked up at me with an open and equal one; but Martin Fraser knew nothing of the wiles of women. I remembered that I was a woman, and felt sure I could not be a match for that my dark-blue eyes were considered expressive, that I looked my best in that dress, and when he accosted me with an air of grave preoccupation and of courteous indifference that would not permit me to suppose that he noticed my beauty, I wished to think that all I knew of astronomy was what I had learned at schools, and I was ashamed.

The grave, austere man said at once:

"My father, Mr. Fraser, is altogether confined to his room, and he has very few visitors. I will ask from you. Upon me devolves the honor of showing you the telescope, and I am ready when you like."

He rose, and, while I adjust it, will you oblige him by conversing with him for a few minutes? Lucy will be down immediately."

The child rose, and, taking my hand again in her firm hold, led me to the old man's sitting-room.

"You are like your mother, child," he said, after looking at me long: "you have her face and her voice, but not her eyes."

"I have not seen her since I was a child," I answered, for the first time giving the simple description of my mother.

"Just like him," laughed the old man: "I remember that he was always blind to her beauty as well as I do my son Martin. You have seen my son, young lady? Yes, I thought so; and this is my grandchild, Lucy. Lucy, you will be the light of the old clock; for my son is not a marrying man, and he will never have a child of his own. He has no ways to keep her name, and be the founder of another line of Frasers."

The child stood with pensive, downcast eyes, as though already bowed down by her weight of cares and responsibilities, while the deep, harsh old, till the deep tones of an organ resounded through the house.

My uncle is ready for us," she said to me.

We passed at the library door, for I held my hand reluctantly—as I do to this day—to every object listening to the wonderful music the organ poured forth. It was such as I had never heard before; roaring and swelling like the resolved engine of the sea; and, here and there, a single swelling note which seemed to pierce me with an unspeakable pain. When it had ended, I stood before Martin Fraser silent and subdued.

The telescope had been carried out to the end of the terrace, where the house could not intercept our views; and neither Lucy Fraser and Pfeiffer the astronomer. We stood upon the highest point of an imperceptibly rising table-land, the horizon of which was from twenty to forty miles distant. An infinite dome of sky was expanded above us, an ocean of firmament of which the dwellers among houses and mountains can have but little conception. The troops of glittering stars, the dark, brooding night, the unaccustomed voices of my companions, deepened the awe that oppressed me, and, as I took my place at them, I became as earnest and occupied as themselves. I forgot every thing but the tremendous wonders of the universe revealed to me, and the majestic sweep of the planets across the field of the telescope. What a profound science and delight it can cause ever me! What floods of thought came, wave upon wave, across my mind! And how insignificant I felt before this wilderness of worlds!

I asked, with the humility of a child—for all effrontcries had been left behind—"Are they all the same again soon?

Martin Fraser met my uplifted eyes with a keen and penetrating look. I did not quail under it, for I was thinking only of the stars. As he looked, his mouth relaxed into a pleased and genial smile.

"We shall always be glad to see you," he repeated.

Barbara was sitting up for me when I returned, and was about to address me with some worldly speculation, when, with a sudden impulse, I stopped her. "Not one word, Barbara, not one question, or I shall never go to Mr. Holmes again."

I can not dwell upon details. I went often to the house. Into the dull routine of Mr. Fraser's and Lucy's life, I (I suppose) like a sunbeam, or sunshine, lighting up the cloud that had been weeping over it for years. To the thought which, some excitement and merriment, and so I became almost necessary to them. But over myself there came a power of restraint incredible then and now. I had been frivolous, self-seeking, soulless; but I had begun with the child, and the spell which began that came in its train, awoke me from my inanity, to a life of mental activity. I studied solidly for my purpose; for I had at once perceived that Martin Fraser was as distant and as self-poised as the planet Saturn, that he was a man of keenly alligent and insatiable pupil, and he was to me only a grave and exacting master, to be propitiated by my most profound reverence. Each time I crossed the threshold of his quiet home, all the worldliness and frivolity of previous life from my soul like a foul and sullied garment, and I entered as into a temple, simple, holy, and unassuming.

The happy summer passed away, the autumn crept on, and for eight months I had visited the Frasers continually—twice in a week, by week, or, at least, intentionally deceived them.

Martin Fraser's life had long looked forward to an eclipse of the moon, which was to occur early in October. I left my home alone in the twilight of that evening, my thoughts dwelling upon the coming pleasure, when, just as I drew near The Elms, I heard Barbara's voice, in the long room with whom I had flirted in former times.

"Good-evening, Stella," he exclaimed, familiarly. "I have not seen you for a long time. Ah! I see you are pursuing other game I suppose; but are you not aiming rather too high this time? There is an ore in luck just now, for if Martin Fraser does not cease forward, there is George Yorke, just home from Australia with an income, a handsome home, and he is longing to remind you of some trifling passages between you and myself, when he was showing us a look of your hair after dinner at the Crown yesterday."

I uttered a few words in reply with no outward demonstration; but the reality and mortification of my degradation were agonizing me; and, hastening forward to my sanctuary, I sought the presence of my little Lucy Fraser.

"I have come to my evening to-day," she said. "I have been deceitful. I think I ought to tell you, that you may not be deceived in me. I do not wish you to love me as much as ever. I have not told a story, but I have acted one."

Lucy Fraser's little head lay very low upon her tiny fingers, and her eyes closed in silent self-reading.

"My uncle came," she continued, looking for a moment, and blushing like a woman, "that woman are, perhaps, less truthful than men. Because we are weak, we are happy to strength, they do not by cunning. They live falsely. They deceive their own souls, and sometimes others, only for amusement. He has taught me some words which I shall understand better some day."

Lucy Fraser's voice ceased, and I heard the words:

And it will follow as the night the day,
Thou canst not then be false to any man."

I stood like one who is troubled and speechless, listening with burning cheeks.

"Grandpapa showed me a verse in the Bible which I will learn by heart. It is in Proverbs, I believe than death the woman whose heart is snares and nets, and her hands as bands: whoso pleaseth God shall escape from her, but the sinner shall be taken by her."

I hid my face in my hands though no eye was on me; for Lucy Fraser had veiled hers with their tremulous lids; and, as I stood confounded and ashamed, a hand was laid upon my arm, and Martin Fraser's voice said,

"Stella, I love you."

I started at this first utterance of my name, which he had never spoken before. I was completely answered, when I found that Lucy Fraser was not to accompany us on the terrace. As Martin Fraser assisted me to the telescope, my feelings adjusted for my use, I shrank from him.

"What is the meaning of this, Stella?" he exclaimed, as I burst into tears. "Shall I speak to you now, Stella?" he said, "while there is yet time, before you leave us. Does your heart cling to us as our hearts cling to you, till we dare not think of the cold world left to its or home when you are gone? We did not live before we knew you. You are our health and our life. I have loved you as I never watched a woman before, and I feel no fault in you, my pearl, my jewel, my star. Hitherto, woman and deceit have been inseparably conjoined in my mind; your truest heart is the home of truth. I know you have had no thought of this, and my wholeness alarms you; but tell me plainly if you can love me?"

He had taken me in his arms, and my head rested against his strongly throbbing heart. His sternness and austerity were gone, and he offered me his undiminished wealth of a love that had not been wasted in fickle likings. My success was perfect, and how gladly would I have remained there till my whole life was grown obscure! But Barbara rose to my memory, and Lucy Fraser's words still lingered in my ears. The black shadow eating away the heart of the moon seemed to pause in its measured motion. All heaven looked down upon us through the solemn stars. The rustling leaves were hushed, and the neuted autumn breeze ceased to moan. I was a cloud of cruel treachery, whereas echoed the cry of my awakened conscience. I withdrew myself from him, and shame-stricken,

"Martin Fraser," I said, "I am under constrain me to be true. I am the falsest woman you ever met. I came here with the black shadow resting after the manner of a child, and if you had ever gone and sets our minds, you would have heard of me only as a flirt, a heartless coquette. I have all my being debased to your dreams, and the bitterness of death to your heart. Do not look upon me; you have patience, and I will write to you!"

He would have detained me, but I sprang away, and, running swiftly down the avenue, I passed out of my Eden, with the sentence of perpetual banishment in my heart. The moon was at the full, and a horror of darkness and dismay engulfed me, as I stood shivering and sobbing under the restless poplars.

Barbara met me as I hastened to hide myself in my own room, and, with her cold, unswerving eyes fixed inquiringly on me, said,

"Well, what is the matter with you?"

"Nothing," I answered, "only I am tired of astronomy, and I shall not go to Tim Holmes again. I am ill, I think."

"I always said so," she replied. "However, to-day intelligence to a crisis. I perceive that your notice we should leave at Christmas. Then you are satisfied that it would be a waste of time to continue any longer."

"Quite," I said, and passed on to my room, to lonely, dismal hours, the worst of that night, what desolation and hopelessness meant.

The next day I wrote to Martin Fraser, in every truth and sorrow, accepting the full responsibility, and with a false pride even in my utter humiliation, I told him that I had not loved, and did not love him.

The first object upon which my eyes rested every joyless morning, were the tall poplar trees, waving round his house, and beckoning maidenly to me. I had lost that night all my pride, all the steady light in his library, shining like a star from the low-lands. But him I could never see; for my letter had been an explicit avowal, a hope; and I could not, for shame, attempt to melt his heart by tears. All that remained for me was to return to my former life, if I could by my means and my thoughtfulness, and blotting out with the husks that had once satisfied me.

George Yorke renewed his addresses to me, offering me wealth and a home in Australia. I was a mere temptation; for before me lay a monotonous road, dotted like with Barbara, and the hard-cared-for old age. Why could not I live as thousands of other women, who were not unhappy in their lot? I remembered a story that I had read in one of Martin's books: "It is not always our best wisdom to marry; but we should be led astray by right; not to purchase happiness by loss of honor; not to avoid unwelcomeness by untruthfulness." I looked at my own face steadily to meet the bleakness and barrenness of my lot, I rejected the proposals.

Barbara was terribly exasperated; and very miserable we both were, until she accepted an invitation to spend the Christmas with one of her sisters, while I was left, with my old nurse, to superintend the empty house. Barbara had no desire to linger in our old home till the last moment; and I was glad to be alone on Christmas-day in the neighborhood of The Elms, and to think and make my mental record of all its associations and remembrances. Many times the place knew me more, but, on Christmas-eve, I wandered through the empty rooms, not more empty than my heart, which was being divested of its old memories, and never but deeper tenderness, until I passed mechanically under the door, where I had often looked across to The Holmes.

The air had been dense and murky all day, with thickly falling snow; and the moon was over, and the meadows sky bright with stars: while the glistening snow-flakes, through my mind picture after picture, dream within dream, visions of the happiness that might have been mine.

As I stood thus, with tears stealing through the clasped hands that covered my eyes, my nurse came in to close the shutters. She started suddenly when she saw me.

"I thought you were your mother," she exclaimed. "I have seen her stand just so, hundreds of times."

"Seem, how was it that my mother did not marry Mr. Fraser?"

"They were like other people—didn't understand one another, much as they were in love," she answered. "Mr. Fraser's first marriage had been for money, and was not a happy one, so he had grown something stern. They quarrelled, not your mother was provoked to marry Mr. Gretton, your father. Well! Mr. Fraser became an old man all at once, did scarcely ever left his own house; so that she never saw him again, near as he lived; though I have often seen her, when your father was off to hills or races or public meetings, standing here just as you stood now. Only the last time you were in her room, she was leaning against this window when I brought you in to say good night, and she whispered softly, looking up to Heaven, "I have tried to do my duty to my husband and to my little child!"

"Nurse," I said, "I know you; do not shut the window yet." It was no longer a selish emotion that possessed me. I had been answering their there was no sorrow like my sorrow; but my mother's error had been graver, and her trials more than mine. Those burden-like words had weighed her down into an early grave; but it had not passed away from earth with her. Its results were heavily committed by her death, upon the heart of the aged man, who, doubtless, in the quiet of pitiless time, was revolving the events of his past life with, I fear, bitterness, because it was the saddest of them all. I longed to ask him once again—to enter into the frosty night.

Yet, the window was uncertained. I could tell that at the open gate; and I should see him, whom my mother loved, lying alone and unchevered upon his couch, as he would be when I was gone to years through till Lucy Fraser was old enough to be a daughter to him. And then I remembered the rumor that Lucy, my grandchild was dying, which Susan had told me sorrowfully an hour or two ago; and my grandchild, I knew, was not really until I stood before the window.

It was no longer an invalid's room; the couch was gone and the sheltering screen, and Lucy's little chair within it. Neither were there any splendiums of modern luxury or wealth; no gorgeous nor coloring, nor gorgeousness: it was simplicity in library and workroom of a busy student, who was forgetful and careless of comfort. Yet, such as it was, my heart recognized it as home. There Martin sat, now, as was his wont, with pen and pencil calculations, and frequent reference to the books that were strewn about.

Could I be mistaken that yonder shoulder man had once spoken passionately to me of love, and now he was there, so calm, so earnest, apparently almost within reach of my hand, while I, like an outcast, stood in cold, and darkness, and misery? Was there, with the sole of my footstep lingering about the threshold, and no shadowy memory of my face entering between him and the pages which had forfeited the right to sit beside him, reading the observations of which he had noted down, so long ago? the pilgrim that was deepening on his nature; and I had not the hope, which would have been sufficient to keep a combatant from fear, that some other woman, more true and more worthy, would by-and-by earn my forfeited place?

I heard a bell within, and Martin rose and left the room. I wondered if I should have time to creep in, and steal out all but near enough to hear, which had been drawn aside carelessly; but, as I tremblingly laid my hands of the glass door, and it turned, searing in his arms the emaciated form of little Lucy Fraser. He had wrapped her carefully in a large shawl, and now, as he stood so near to the fire and placed her in it, every rigid lineament of his countenance was softened into tenderness. I stretched out my arms toward him with an instinctive yearning to be gathered again to his noble heart, and knew that child and darkness disregarded. I turned away, with this last tender image of his greatness in my memory, to retrace my steps to my desolate home.

There was a sudden twittering in the ivy overhead, and a little bird, rushed out of its nest into the cold night air, came fluttering down, and then against the lighted panes. It was a robin's nest, by which had been uneasy at my vicinity before, stood buzying at the window, and I had only time to engage and hide myself among the shrubs when he opened it, and stepped out upon the terrace. The day tracked down the path by which I had come, barking joyfully as he caressed along the open fields; and, as Martin looked round, I covered more closely with my dripper shoulders. I know he must find me; for my footmarks were plain upon the newly-fallen snow, and an overwhelming sensation of shame and gladness overpowered me. He saw him less the footprints once or twice, but at last he was upon the right track, and, with a few bounds beneath which I had hidden, he found me among the trees. I was crouching, and he stooped down curiously.

"It is Stella," I said faintly.

"Stella!" he echoed.

He lifted me from the ground like a trunk child, whom he had expected home every evening, carried me across the terrace into the library, and set me down in the light and warmth of his own presence. Not little kiss to the child, whose eyes beamed with a strange light upon us; and then, taking both my hands in his, he bent down and looked in my face. I met his gaze unshrinkingly, eye to eye. We sounded the depths of each other's heart in that long, unwavering look. Never more could there be doubt or mistrust; never again deception or misconstruction, between us.

Our star had arisen, and full orbed, rounded into perfection, shed a soft and brilliant light upon the years to come. Chime after chime, like the marriage peal of our souls, came the sound of distant bells across the snow, and roused us from our reverie.

"I must go," I said, and sprang back, but Martin to me. "I believed you would come back to me, somehow, at some time; but this evening I heard that you were gone, and I was telling Lucy Fraser so, not long since. She has been pining to see you."

Now, he suffered me to take the child upon my lap, and she nestled closely to me, with a weary sigh, resting her head upon my bosom. Just then, we heard the carol singers coming up the avenue, and Martin drew the curtains over the window, before which they stationed themselves to sing the carol of the morning—"Hark the herald."

When the singers ended and raised their cry of "Be wish you a merry Christmas," I rose to open the door. Martin came out into the porch to speak to them, and I hid my face in the child's curls, and thanked God who had so changed me.

"But what is this, Martin?" I cried in terror, as I raised my head, on his return.

The child's eyelids were closed, and her little arm hand had grown less and nerveless.

Immediately he was by my side, and his arms like a withering flower.

"It is only fainting," said Martin; "she has been drooping ever since you left us, Stella; and my only hope of her recovery rests in your ministrations now."

All that night, I sat with the little child resting on my bosom; revived from time to time by tears, and sleeping quietly in my arms because she was already beginning to share in the life and joy and brightness of my own. There was no sudden sleep and tranquility inclosing us in a blissful coma, interrupted only once by a messenger from Martin, who had been called by Martin in a state of the utmost perplexity and alarm.

The hopeful Christmas morning dawned. I asked my nurse to arrange my hair in the style in which my mother used to wear it, and I dressed myself in a dress which Susan, Mr. Fraser received me as his daughter with great emotion and affection. Never could I forget, other than Stella, I was satisfied to be identified with my mother. Then in the course of the morning, I had a scene of trembling and weeping recited me, which could only be soothed by their fondest assurances. After which I had a long talk with songs, with nothing in them but their simple melody; and Mr. Fraser sitting by, listening to every word of the hymns he came; and Lucy's eyes almost laughed.

Then Martin took me home along the familiar path, which I had so often traversed alone and loneless; but the excess of happiness overcame me, and at every turn I paused and I crept closer to him, with a sweet sense of being protected.

One sunset day in January, still blithe Lucy and triumphant dictatress Barbara for my bridesmaids, I accepted, hanging on the arm of my father, the hand of Martin Fraser's wife. And even in the scenes of the empty-handed folly of my girlhood, I thenceforward found time and to do my duty in love, gratitude, and devotion. Only at first, Martin preached to me, and I used to say at night I had come to have a last glimpse, not of him, but of his father: I knowing nothing of the change that had transformed Mr. Fraser's sitting-room into his own study.

THE GHOST IN THE DOUBLE ROOM.

BY G. AUGUSTUS SALA.

Was the next Ghost on my list. I had noted the rooms down in the order in which they were drawn, and this was the next in order. Therefore, I invoked the Spectre of the Double Room, with the usual result, and, when we all observed John Herschel's wife to be much affected, and we all refrained, as if by common consent, from glancing at one another. Alfred Rayling, with his usual good feeling which are never wanting in him, whispered, "Don't you know?" and, "Haunted the Double Room to be haunted by the Ghost of the Ague.

"What is the Ghost of the Ague like?" asked every one, when there had been a laugh.

"Like?" echoed Alfred, with his usual air. "What is the Ague like?" asked somebody.

"Don't you know?" said Alfred. "Tell me you."

We had both, Tilly—by which affectionate diminutive I mean my adored Matilda—and your humble servant agreed that it was not only inexpedient, but, in fact, a positive impertinence if in duty we owed to the community at large, to wait any longer for Alfred's explanation, and we put forward against the baleful effects of long engagements; and Tilly began to quote poetry of a nocturnal character, and I to make certain entertained different opinions. My uncle Boone wrote to me, and to my father, to the Guardian-ensurance Uuk Something or Other Company, in which undertaking I was vicariously interested, were at a premium—that is to say, they were dropping down for years. Tilly's papa and mamma called Tilly a girl and myself a boy, when we observed their annoyance. As, however, our parents and guardians were not used to be contradicted, Matilda and I were not permitted to add another couple to the catalogue of historically unfortunate lovers. Uncle Boone, who was in the Uuk Something Sandfish (my Tilly's papa and mamma) at last relented. Much was elicited during this delicate communication by my arguments against celibacy, contained in eight pages foolscap, and of which I made copies in triplicate for the benefit of our hunhearted relatives. More was done by Tilly threatening to poison herself. Most, however, was accomplished by our both making up our minds to tell a piece thereof to our parents and guardians, and telling them that if they did not acquiesce in our views we would run away and get married at the very first opportunity. There was no just cause or impediment. We were young, healthy, and had plenty of money between us. Loads of money—as we thought then. As to personal appearance, Tilly was simply lovely, and my whiskers had not been ill spoken of in the best society in Dover. So it was all arranged, and on the twenty seventh of December, eighteen fifty dash, being the morrow of Boxing-day, Alfred Starling, gent., was to be united in the holy bonds of matrimony to Matilda, only daughter of Captain Rockleigh Standfast, R.N., of Smargatestime Villa, Dover.

I had been left an orphan at a very early age, and the guardian to my moderate property (including the shares in the Caerlyon-upon-Usk Something or Other concern), and guardian of my person, was my uncle Boone. He sent me to Merchant Taylors, and afterward for a couple of years to college in Bonn, on which, He afterwards—I keep me out of mischief, I believe—paid a handsome premium for my admission into the counting-house of Messrs. Baum, Brimm, and Boompiers, German merchants of Finsbury Circus, under whose tuition I did a little business in the corresponding department, and was much envied by my brother salaried clerks. My uncle Boone resided chiefly at Dover, where he was making large sums of money by government contracts, whose objects apparently consisted in boring holes in the chalk and then filling them up again. My uncle was, perhaps, the most respectable man in Europe, and was well known in the city of London as "Respectable Boone." He was one of those men who are confidently said to be good for any amount. He had a waistcoat—worn winter and summer—a waistcoat that, in the days of my youth, was a single bell and a story drab, which looked so infinitely respectable that I am certain if it had been presented at the Queen's levee or the lord in Lobelia street the clerks would have cashed it at once for any amount of gold demanded. My uncle Boone entertained himself behind this astonishing garment as behind a fortification, and dispensed hospitality from it. That waistcoat had carried resolutions, assuaged the ire of indignant shareholders, and, by means of a waverting schemes, and brought in thumping subscriptions for burned-out Coffees and destitute Foreigners. I was a safe speculation, and I knew it as well as mine. He was mixed up with a good many companies, but whenever I was pressed for information as to their with a plan, my responsible uncle would confer with his waistcoat, and within five minutes would either tell me the number or promoter to walk out of his counting-house, or put his name down for a thousand pounds. He was a director of the noble Man Responsible Bonser put his name down for.

It was arranged that I was to go down to Dover on Christmas-eve, staying at my uncle's, and that we were to dine all together at Captain Standfast Smargatestime Villa. Boxing-day we to be elected to bonnets on the part of my beloved, and to the signing and sealing of certain releases, deeds, covenants, and other documents connected with law and money, on the part of self, my uncle, and my prospective father-in-law on the twenty-seventh we were to be MARRIED.

Of course my connexion with Messrs. Baum, Brimm, and Boompiers was a sacred one, and not a basket eighty-seven times, a unanimous cheval acceptance, on the part of the firm, of my duties. It was "golly good fellow." I was unwillingly compelled to leave Tilly on the night of Christmas-eve. The express mail on Christmas-eve, being engaged to a farewell dinner at four, at the mansion of our Right Most Honorable and dinner-giving friend Alderman in the firm, in Finsbury Circus. A capital dinner it was, and very merry. I left the gentlemen over their wine, and had just time to pop into a cab and catch the mail train at London Bridge.

You know that the train passes on a railway journey when one has dined comfortably before starting. And when I began, about seven o'clock, to have no Dover, to rapidly were the eighty odd miles skimmed over. But it now becomes my duty to impart to you the knowledge of my Terrible Misfortune. In my youth, a little boy at a preparatory school, I was afflicted, I had presumption ever the carriage drove away, Captain Standfast, R.N., looking at me as savagely as though he would have risked to have me up at the gangway, and give me nine dozen on the instant, said,

"There goes poor Tilly's diamond bracelet. The odd screw won't give it her now. I saw the cuss on the cushion of the fly."

Was it my fault? could I help my lamentable age?

At dinner I went from bad to worse. Item: I spilled one bottle of mock turtle soup over a new damask tablecloth. Item: I upset a glass of Madeira over Mary Ann's blue moire dress. Item, in a convulsive fit of shaking, I nearly stabbed Lieutenant Lush, of the Fifty-fourth Regiment, stationed on the Heights, with a silver fork; and, finally, in a maniacal attempt to carve a turkey, I sent its carcass right of the Christmas bird, with a garland of sausages clinging to it, full into the responsible waistcoat of my uncle Bonsor.

He grew quite purple somehow; I am sure I don't know in what manner, but half an hour afterward we were all very pleasant and talkative over our dessert. When I say all, I of course except my unhappy self. There had been no solution of continuity in my shaking. Somebody, I think, proposed my health. In returning thanks, I hit the pyramid of preserves below under the left eye with my elbow. Endeavoring to regain my equilibrium, I sent a full glass of claret into the embroidered cambric bosom of that unhappy lieutenant Lush. In desperation, I caught hold of the tablecloth with both hands. I saw how it would be, and, by a dexterous jerk, the whole concern would be over the dessert. When I say all, I of course except my unhappy self. There had been no solution of continuity in my shaking. Somebody, I think, proposed my health. In returning thanks, I hit the pyramid of preserves below under the left eye with my elbow. Endeavoring to regain my equilibrium, I sent a full glass of claret into the embroidered cambric bosom of that unhappy lieutenant Lush. In desperation, I caught hold of the tablecloth with both hands. I saw how it would be, and, by a dexterous jerk, the whole concern would be over the dessert. When I say all, I of course except my unhappy self. There had been no solution of continuity in my shaking. Somebody, I think, proposed my health. In returning thanks, I hit the pyramid of preserves below under the left eye with my elbow. Endeavoring to regain my equilibrium, I sent a full glass of claret into the embroidered cambric bosom of that unhappy lieutenant Lush. In desperation, I caught hold of the tablecloth with both hands. I saw how it would be, and, by a dexterous jerk, the whole concern would be over the dessert.

I turned my foot frantically round the leg of the table nearest me, and with a great crash over went dining-table, cut-glass decanters, and dessert. Lieutenant Lush was lucky at starting, for the top of the nose with a pair of silver nut-crackers, and my uncle Bonsor's head was crowned, in spite a plaster, and bows, red tape, the Army List, looking-cap paper, and parchment; and my uncle Bonsor was many respectable than ever. Captain Standfast was a paper to sign at last, whispering much among themselves as they did so; and I protest that I should not wanting had a larger pen, digging about in a field of green table-cloth, while on the paper at last, and crabbed characters meant to sing up and down in a crazed and furious manner. I endeavored to serve myself for the task of signing. I lit on a pencil, I clenched my left hand, I tried to screw my wagging head on to my neck, I cramped my toes up as tight as they could be screwed, but was it my fault, when I clutched the pen and tried to write my name, that the abominable goosequill began to dance, and shake, and leap, and caper, and dig its nibs into the paper; that when, in despair, I used the blotting-pad, to blot the name to be open, I shook its sable contents, in horrid, horned, lassoed blots, all over a grave legal document? I finished my autograph unfinished, and made my mark on my uncle's sacred waistcoat, and hitting Captain Standfast under the third rib with my elbow,

"That will do," my pegs-in-law cried, collaring me. "Leave the house, scoundrel!"

But I loved him, this grasp, and I fled to the drawing-room, knowing that my Tilly would be there with her indefatigable and her mamma.

"Tilly—my adored Matilda." I cried.

"No further explanation is needed, sir," broke in my beloved, in an inexorable tone. "Leave mean and heart quite enough. Alfred Starling, I would sooner veil the maimed than wed with a pamphlet on you cliff than become the bride of a profligate nut drunkard. Go, sir; repent if you can; be ashamed if you can. Henceforth we are strangers. Slave of self-indulgence, adieu forever!" And she swept out of the room, and tore off her shoe bonnet and pretty heart out in the boudoir beyond.

I was discarded and expelled forever from Snargatestons Villa; my uncle Bonsor repudiated me, and disinherited me from any share in the family cost; I hurried myself into the next train at the station, and shook all the way back to town. At about this time, old Arnold Bonsor died, I believe, by myself wandering and joking about the parlours of Soho.

From Soho-square—the southwest side, I think —branches a shabby, dingy little court, called Batman's buildings. I was standing moodily idle at the corner of this ill-favored place, when I stumbled against a gentleman, who, habited about seven-eighths soldier and one-eighth civilian.

He was a little, dapper, clean-limbed, youngfaced, old man, with a rubicund nose, and white hair and whiskers. Soldiers, save in the cavalry, didn't wear mustachios. He wore a blue surtout coat, rather white at the seams, and a silver medal with a faded ribbon on his breast. He had a bunch of particoloured ribbons in his waistcoat-up; he carried a bamboo-cane under his arm; on each sleeve he wore golden stripes, much tarnished; and his scarlet collar was embroidered a golden lion; and on his shoulders he had a pair of little, light, golden epaulets, that very much resembled the sets of teeth from a dentist's glass-case, covered with bullion.

"And how are you, my hearty?" said the military gentleman, cheerily.

I answered that I was the most miserable wretch in the world; upon which the military gentleman, slapping me on the back and calling me his gallant comrade, asked me to have a pint of beer, warmed with a little spice, and a dash of Old Tom in it, for the sake of Christmas.

"You're a roving buck," observed my new friend, "I'm a roving buck. You never happened to have a twin-brother named Sph, did you?"

"No," I answered, meekly.

"He was as like you as two peas," continued the military gentleman, who had by this time taken my arm, and was leading me all shaking and clattering toward a mouldy little tavern, on whose door-jambs were displayed a couple of colored cartoons, framed and glazed and much fly-blown, and displaying, the one, the presentment of an officer in full-dress uniform much injured with wine, and the other a bombshell with an enormous shako clamping the latter into a cannon: the whole surmounted by a placard setting forth that many young seen were required for the Honorable East India Company's infantry, and that they would, and earnestly exhorting all smart young men, as aforesaid, to apply forthwith at the Bombshell and Chutney, who was always to be heard of at the bar of the "Highland Laddie," or at the office in Baker street, Portman square.

"The last time I saw him," went on the man with the silver face and the golden epaulets, after he had tilted me into the "Highland Laddie," pinned me, shaking, against the bar-counter, and ordered me a glass of sophisticated rum, "was in the service, and was a field-marshal in the army of the Shah of Oude. I was a captain then. I've seen him with his cocked-hat and diwnod epaulets riding on a white elephant, with fire-and-twenty tiled turbaned footmen after him on foot, all in red, and draw the soda-water corks. Such lovely hot lives with a field-marshal's commission and generous cousins in this very police!"

It is useless to recall the narrative of my conversation with the military gentleman; suffice it to say, that within an hour I had taken the fatal shilling, and enlisted in the service of the Honorable East India Company. I was not a beggar. I possessed property which would have made Bonsor had no control. I had not committed any crime, but I felt lost, ruined, and desperate, and I enlisted. I am a coward, when I look back upon the magistrate to be attested, and before a surgeon to be examined as to my capability of undergoing the service, my agony seemed entirely to have left me. I stood firm and upright in the witness-box, and under the examining physician I was as much distressed by shame and anguish at the mixed-measure, and by my cowardice in Dover from negotiating for my discharge.

I had scarcely reached the East India recruiting depot at Chatham, when I was seized with an attack of ague returned with redoubled severity. At first, on my arrival, that I had come to the depot, and begun to train me for a bandsman, but I could not keep a wind instrument in my hands, and struck those that I have played from my shaking mouth. Then I was put into the awkward squad among the raw recruits, and endeavored to learn, but I could never get beyond the preliminary drill of the goose-step, and I kept my own time, and not the regulation one. Then I was put into some woeful place the slightest crookery in my ague, and the sergeant-major, with a fearful oath, reported, that I was a shilking, "malingering" impostor. Among my comrades, who despised, without pity, my woe, I got the nickname of "Mary Ann Shivery-Shakery." And the most wonderful thing is, that although I could not keep a musical instrument in, from time, the thought of purchasing my discharge never entered my poor, shaking, jarring head.

How long I remained in the recruiting, infirm creature as a soldier to India, I can't make out; but what I was, by no means, a step-boy, with seven or eight hundred more recruits. My military career in the East came to a very speedy and inglorious termination. I had scarcely arrived at Bombay when the battalion of the European regiment to which I was finally consigned set up-country to the banks of the Sutlej, where the Sikh war was then raging. It was the cantonments of Allahabad, however, I went very little that I saw of that glorious epoch in our military annals. In consequence of exposure to my nervous disorder, I was only permitted to form part of the baggage-guard, and one night, after perhaps ten days' march, I was missed. I had been shaken more awfully, an attack was made on our force for some reason or other, and I was carefully undshaken or thieves. Nothing was easier than to put them pokey scoundrels to the rest. I had been brave enough as a boy, and as a young man. I declare that on the present occasion I should have stood my ground, and perished sword in the mastery of me. I shook my musket out of my hands, my shako off my head, and my knapsack off my back, and then, shaking my heels and jolted me, as it seemed, over miles of arid country. There was some fighting the next day afterward, and some of flogging me; but corporeal punishment did not exist in the Company's regiments. I was sent to a vile place of incorporation called a "congee house," where I was fed principally on rice-water, and left. Then I was conveyed to Bombay, tried by court-martial, sentenced, and publicly drummed out of my regiment. Yes, I, the son of a gentleman, and the possessor of acquired private property, had the privilege of all that. I was one of the "scum of the Rogues' March," was dismissed from the service of the Honorable East India Company with ignominy left disgrace.

I can scarcely tell how I reached England again; whether I went over in a ship, or swam it, or flew it, or whether I worked my passage home. I can only remember that the ship in which I was a passenger broke her back in Algoa Bay, close to the Cape, and became a total wreck. There was not the slightest danger: we were within sounding, and small craft, and every soul on board was saved; but I shook so terribly and incessantly while the boats were leaving the vessel, that the whole ship's company hooted and groaned at me when I was shoved over the side, and I was not allowed to go in the long-boat, but was towed alone and aft in the long-boat.

I took passage in another ship, which did nothing but shake all the way from the Cape to Plymouth, and at last I reached England. I wrote innumerable letters to my friends and relatives, to Tilly, and to my uncle Bonsor; but the only response I received was a few formal lines from my uncle's lawyer, telling me that my illegible scrawls had driven the hands of the persons for whom they were designed; but that no further notice could be taken of my communications. I was put into the possession of my property to the last penny, but it seems to me that I must have shaken it away in either set dice or laughing in gambling-hells. And I remember that I never made a mark in the latter game without hitting my adversary with the cue in the cheek, temple, or even the marker, sending the balls scudding through the window, shattering the cocoa-nut pyramid-bules in the cloth, for which I had to pay guineas afterward, to the proprietor of the rooms.

I remember one day going into a jeweler's shop in Regent Street to purchase a watch-key, I had only a short time to stay, my cold repeater had been shaken away in some unaccountable manner. It was windy weather, and I was arrayed in a pea-jacket, loose sleeves. While the shop-keeper was adjusting a key to my watch, my ague fit came upon me with phenomenal ferocity, and I fell to stamping and clumsy, in catching hold of the counter to save myself, I lifted a couple of drawers right over. Some fell on the floor; but some, O horror and anguish! fell into the sleeves of my overcoat. I shook them out, and I seemed to have shaken diamond rings into my hands, my pockets, my very boots. By some unaccountable impulse I dropped them all, but was seized at the very shop door, and carried, shaking, to the police-station.

I was before the police-magistrate, and committed, still shaking, in a van, to jail. I shook for something like a whole month in jail, when I was brought up, shaking, to the Central Criminal Court, and placed, shaking, on my trial for an attempted robbery of seven hundred pounds' worth of property. The evidence was clear against me. My counsel, in a fit of eloquence, something about "kleptomania," but in vain. My uncle Bonsor, who had come expressly up from the country, spoke strongly against my character. I was found guilty; yes, I, the most innocent and unfortunate young man breathing, was found guilty of seven years' transportation! I can recall the awful scene vividly to memory now. The jury sat on my left, shaking their heads at me. So was the judge, on whom I spilled the water, and the spectators in the gallery; and I was bobbing my head to the spikes on the helps of the railing, shaking from right to left like ten thousand million aspen leaves. My skull was splitting, my brain was bursting, when—

I WOKE AGAIN

I was lying in a very uncomfortable position in a first-class carriage of the Dover mail-train; every time the train stopped, or started, or went jogging to and fro in the lumping; my cramped limbs were swaying to and fro, and the sticks and umbrellas which were lashing in the net-work of the train was "at speed," and my frightful dream was simply due to the violent motion and concussion of the train. Then, sitting up, and rubbing my eyes, immensely relieved, but blushing on by the consideration near me (so violently did the carriages shake from side to side), I began to reason for what I had dreamed or heard of during those hours before: while at on, or while somebody was knocking loudly at the door; and of the odd connection between unusual sound and vision as the thoughts of our innermost souls. And again with still deeper thankfulness, that at one period of my distempered vision, namely, when I was attested and examined as a recruit, I had resisted the temptation still and steady. The temporary freedom from ague I was fain to ascribe to the cushioned seat of the first-class carriage in which I was at Tunbridge Wells. But, thank Heaven, all that was but a dream.

"I mean to shake one's head off!" exclaimed the testy old lady opposite, alluding to the oscillation of the train, as the guard appeared at the window with a sheet of "De—von."

Well, man, it have tin a shaking most unusual all the way down," replied that functionary.

"Thought we should have tin off the line more than once. Beware will be ladled to-morrow morning. 'Night, sir!"—this was to me: I knew the man well. "Merry Christmas and a happy New Year! You'll be wanting a fly to Snargatestons Villa, won't you, sir? Now, por—ryu!"

I did want a fly, and I got one. I knew the driver liberally, and did not scatter his money over the pavement. Mr. Jukes insisted upon my accompanying him to the dining-room of the nearest I arrived. The weather was so "wowsly cold," he said. I joined the merry party at supper, and was received by my Tilly with open arms, and by my uncle Bonsor with an open waistcoat. A portrait in cheerful moderation of the misjudgment fortitudes of Christmas-eve. We all dined together on Christmas-day, and I helped the soup and carved a turkey, beautifully; and on the morrow, Boxing-day, we complimented by our uncle's lawyer on my remarkably neat calligraphy, as displayed in the signatures to the necessary legal documents. On the twenty-seventh of December, eighteen forty-six, I was married to my darling Tilly, and was going to live happy ever afterward, when —really did wake in bed in this Haunted House—and found that I had been very much shaken on the railway coming down, and that there was no marriage, no Tilly, no Mary Seaton, no Van Phael, no any thing but myself and the Ghost of the Agon, and the two inner windows of the Double Room rattling like the ghosts of two departed watchmen who wanted spiritual assistance to carry me to the dead and gone old Watch-house.

I WOKE AGAIN

THE GHOST IN THE PICTURE ROOM.

BY MISS A PROCTER.

DELINDA, with a modest self-accusation quite her own, promptly answered for this Spectre in a low, clear voice:

The lights extinguished; by the hearth I knelt, Watching with a dreamer's fancies,
The flickering ghost shadows, gathering near, Clothed in mysterious forms, and dimly seen;
And still, all dark; save when the leaping flame, Gaunting, lit up The Picture's ancient frame,
Above the hearth it hung. Perhaps the night,
My foolish fancies, or the gleaming light,
Lent Power to that Portrait dark and quaint—
A Portrait such as Rembrandt loved to paint—
The Picture of a Nun. I seemed to trace
A world of sorrow in the patient face,
The folded hands, the meek, down-bent breast—
Around the room's shadow hid the rest.
And, as I gazed, I thought the lips grew pale,
And half forgot that I was kneeling there,
Came back to me, linked to the present hour,
The memory of the past, with all its power to pain.

In the far South, where clustering vines are hung
Where first the old chivalric days were sung;
Where Spanish Beauty, queenly, stately, still Trance,
Angel and Knight and Deity, called Romance,
Lived out her day. The warm sun shone on me,
Upon the castle; there was one my orchard,
Where, 'neath the trees, I wandered with my love,
Without a thought of sorrow, fear, or grief,
All still, all silent, save the rolling rush
Of the fierce bounding flood, that from our hush
Upon the beach; where, glittering toward the strand,
In the sun's splendor, sparkled the white sand:

All still, all peaceful; when a convent chime
Broke on the mid-day silence for a time,
Then ceased, and left the quiet, serene, as ever,
In deeper silence and more utter peace.
Then I was called to gaze, with many others,
On the dark mystery that from nuns' spirits
Veiled their true beauty, or, at least, to judge
Before their choice of ancient rule and creed,
Who knew the story of each vow and bill,
And every haunting fancy of the cell.
Within the hall, spoke close to me, and told
The mystic legend of the picture, and said:

Long years ago, a dense and flowering wood,
Still more concealed where the white convent stood,
Rose on the promised valley of the vine,
"Our lady of the Hawthorne" it is name.
Within the wild, which all the year was fair
With the first country rite, or out, or prior,
Before the convent's gate, a young knight
Before that shrine, in prayer, his vigil kept.
For humbler cottage stalls, or village hood,
Or pilgrim's cockle-shell, or scallop shell,
Young hearts that came, weighed down by love or wrong,
To that fair shrine, and left their burden there.
Each passing pilgrim, and each beggar's sight
Well knew, and rest, and welcome, and delight.
But, more than this, the nuns could well impart
Of holy lore, for many a learned clerk
Had taught their lessons, and had left their mark
Of knowledge in their books, and on their walls.
And ladies of high birth, and lowly maids,
Had learned their needle-work, and evil fate,
Found help and blessing at the convent gate.

Of all the nuns, no heart was half so light,
As cymbal-calling gipsies of the night.
No step that glided with such noiseless feet,
As hers, that now the convent's rule must meet.
No voice that rose in choir or pause, so clear,
As hers! but all the others loved her here.
On merely touched by others' pain or woe,
Or sorrow, whether it was known or not known).
Her soft hand laid on sufferer's side or head,
As Mother Angela, the Abbess, said,
Had power to heal. Her voice, like the bird known
No house, no love, no kindred save their own—
Her step, her look, her smile, her every word,
Child, plaything, pupil, rose the bride of Heaven.
And all felt it was Heaven's gain and not its right
That young before the altar, day and night,
Should kneel the fair young novice whose pale brow
The flower beauty, wave the curliest lace:
Because of all, her fond and gentle face
The office she would never miss or share,
Of tending the sick nuns, and soothing them,
To quiet whom the Abbess could not trust
Nature to luminous to that rugher duty.
Her hands were also best for making wreaths
Their Angels loved to count each fruit the bust,
And best for twining round the altar rail
Those garlands which the Abbess would not forbid
To hang on the Madonna's shrine, and hid
Upon the altar steps always at Christmas-tide.
Most keen this time of her own handiness bent,
Her every thought, her every power, intent,
She placed her flowers; then kneeling down in prayer,
As their faint perfume rose before the altar,
So rose her thoughts, as pure and as diverse.
For hours and hours the smoke grew the stiffest,
Till one by one the altar lights shone out,
Till one by one the nuns, with solemn chime,
Gathered around to chant their vesper hymn;
Till one by one the tapers were extinguished,
And "Ave, Maria Stella" filled the night.

But one more longer on those days of grace?
When storms drive near, then quiet haven most cease.
Who, cries of wind, and rain, and hail,
So near the convent wills its breath of flame,
Each sinking shelter, frightened pressed beside,
Sobbing out tales of coming fate and dread.
Then, when the storm was loudest, and the wind
One night came struggling soldiers, with their lead
Of wounded, dying comrades, from the field.
Half pleading, yet as if they could command,
Implored admittance at the convent's care.
There rest, sorry, and left all to needful thirst.
Then, when the storm was loudest, and the wind
Was blowing every shutter and door open,
Some pregnant shingles, heeling silver, or Lombe,
The oldest nun, the Abbess, ordered that
To deem the wounds needing most skillful care;
Even as the youngest nun, with her charm,
And thus to Angels, whose ready will
Was to be found in the convent's care.
The charge of a young wounded knight must fall,
Who knew the wound, the bandage, and all.
Day after day she watched beside his bed,
Till fever left him, and he raised his head,
And spoke to her, and thanked her for her care,
Or her soft voice, uttering more pious word.
And the time came left him, and he rose,
The hours, no longer silent, passed away,
Filled with the sound of his voice, and with his plaints.
She told him legends of the martyr's deaths;
Described the pomps, where, through God's pleasure
Knelt.
Had gained their souls to high and bright a place.
This pious soldier soon and more and more,
Sought her alone, and more and more
And more he felt the power of her sweet voice
Which the chapel stone on Easter Day,
Described the sacraments, gold, and silver bright,
Crossed how many tapers gave their light;
How in solemn detail went on the day,
How the high altar looked on Christmas-day:
How knight and squire, and lord and serf, vied,
And a large star of jewels gleaming bright.
Then told the sign by which they all took seat
How even natural loved to greet her Queen.
How from the Virgin's throne, upon the floor
Down to the long garden, every bead was bent,
And prayer in hand each elder prayed:
At the long dusting heavens were displayed,
They struck the hawthorn boughs, and showed all therein

Of beds and blossoms stirred her way with flowers.
The knight marvelled (indeed), till all he
He too described the glories of his port;
Gateway, and drawbridge, and portcullis, and hall,
And all the lovely ladies who were there.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

But half inexcusable she heard. Could she—
This be the worst? this piece of love and blisse
Where, then, was hid the strangest horror?
That never failed to bring the gentle sleep
She seemed breath'd, sanctified with all his skill,
And still the kindly influence of joy,
The glorified in the golden mine of love.
Then opened your wings, ye angel guardians bright,
And shield them darkling thunderous from and fear;
But no; days passed, nights and vespers rang,
And still the quiet smiled, and, prayed, and sang,
And never groaned the fatal, coiling net
That every day for years had waited near,
Around their darling; for she went and came
About her duties, ordered, calm and free.
The same? ah, no! even when she knelt to pray.
Some cheated dream had power to waken her.
By day went on, and night, but never
Was she unconscious. While dumb grief so feels as take?
Reverently we must, with sensitive tread,
Pass silent, shrouded figures passed and fled.
And all was silent, save the sounding sea,
That sobbed and plashed, and a wailing breeze
That sighed among the gentle-waving trees.

What need to tell that drove so bright and brief,
Of joy unchecked by a dread of grief?
What need to tell how the years of peace must fade,
Before the slow foreboding, clouded mind,
That flushed wearily, with sleepless eyes,
Pleasure and wealth, were nothing to her side,
Of all the world can enjoy hours forget.
And silence drew in the whispers of regret,
Still Angela strove to dream, and strove in vain;
Awakened once, she could not sleep again.
At last a yearning seemed to fill her soul,
A longing that no one could ever know;
Even more, just once again, to see the place
That knew her young and innocent heart's treasure.
The long and weary southern path; to gaze
Upon the haven of first love's delight.
Once more beneath the convent roof to lie,
Once more to look upon the sweet, quiet sunset
Weary and worn—and then, the silence fierce
Within her breast, yet a strange silent force
Within her heart, bade her hope and be sure.
Onward she crawled, and lagged from door to door,
Weighed down with sorrow's load, and strength
Grew less each hour, till one day's dawn at length,
As in the fullness of the world with light,
Showed the broad waters, glittering blue and bright,
And where, amid the harbor's throng,
Just as of old the white convent stood.
Would it know her? Yes, it knew her. Her face
Had lost all trace of youth, of joy, of grace,
Of the pure happy soul that was there.
The nurses Angela met, and asked for
Sister Agnes—almost left. The well-known sound
Startled her, but she could not bear to be found.
And she, who had not wept for long dry years,
Felt the strange relief of remembrance and tears.
Terror and anguish aroused to check her breath,
And she fled back. O God! could this be death?
Crouching against the iron gate, she held
Her every breath against that, and prayed.
But nearer footsteps drew, then seemed to wait;
And then a voice she knew, calling the name
And saw the withered face, on which awoke
Joy at the sight of her, and then she spoke.
And asked the strangest question, "Sister Jo,"
She faltered, "Sister Monica, from sin,
Is she released?" And still she will not come;
Oh take us in, and let me die in peace!"
With scarcely words the tried sister met said,
Until she brought the key to unbar the gate.
The beggar tried to thank her as she knelt
And heard the echoing footsteps die away.
But what felt, when the cool cell was entered near,
And stirred strange trouble in her heart to hear
The voice that was to be her companion now?
A face that came from long, long years ago;
Yet, oh! how sad, how worn, how old!
The young and blooming, fleeting, fair, gone,
But a grave woman, gentle and serene.
The sweet sister lived—but she would have been.
But as she gazed and gazed, a sadness bright
Filled all the place with strangely mingled light;
The sun was there no longer, but instead,
A form with a circle round its head,
A ring of glory; and a face, so meek,
So soft, so tender, . . . Angela began to speak.
And stretched her hands out, crying, "Mary mild,
Mother of sorrows, and of God's own child,
And Mary sent . . . " But the sister's face
Showed how child's, witnesse home at last!
I filled the place. The light that was there,
For all thy daily duties I have done;
Thou knowest I have prayed, and sang, and slept;
Didst then not know, poor child, thy place was kept?
Kind hearts are here, yet were I not the tenderest one
Have hasten to its nurse? God has none.
And early forgiveness may be thy sad meed,
But yet he stoops to give it. More complete
Is love that has forgiveness for its need,
And pleads with thee to raise it. Only Heavven
Can pardon—only sympathy, then, to say
For—
Rose hurried Sister Monica, but where
Was the poor beggar she left there? She was Gone; and she searched in vain, and sought the place
Where she had knelt, but all was bare.
But only Angela at the gateway stood,
Laden with heavenly blessings, and with food.

And never did a day past by again,
But the old portress, with a sigh of pain,
Would murmur for her blessing: only a prayer
That the poor beggar, in her wild despair,
Might find her way back. "Oh, that I could find
Her, and bring her home!" she would then add.
But Angela bore her head, and said no more.
How pitiful her heart! And what was it
Something that directed the brightness of her face
After that day, and made her more than ever
But trouble—but a shadow—nothing more.

Years passed away. Then, one dark day of dread,
Saw all the convent bowing round a bed
Where Angela lay dying; every breath
Struggling beneath the heavy mark of death.
But suddenly a flush lit up her cheek,
Her raised hand was held, and she strove to speak.
So surprising was they listened; not a sound
Was heard, but Angela's voice, so sweet and clear.
The very tapers flames seemed newly stirred,
In such hushed awe the listeners heard.
And then they knew that Angela knelt in prayer.
Her sin, her flight; the sorrow and the strife,
And the return; and, then, the peace and calm,
"Praise God for me, my sisters!" and the pause
Rang up to heaven, far, and clear, and wild,
Again and yet again, then sank and died.
While her white face had such a smile of peace,
They saw not one need bend the music cease;
Then weeping sisters took her to her bench.
Crowned with a wreath of perfumed heather a bloom.

And thus the legend ended. It says
Something is hidden in the mystery
Besides the home, grief's proper place,
Never enough suffered, or asked, or known.
Have we not all, amid life's petty strife,

Some pure ideal of a noble life
That once seemed possible? But we not hear
The flutter of its wings, and feel it near,
And just within our reach I to see. And yet
We lost it in this daily jar and fret.
And now love idle to its goal, and it will wait,
But still our place is kept, and it will wait,
Ready for us, in our home or isle.
No one is ever lost we have once seen,
We always may be what we might have been.
Since all that is beautiful remains, and in their breath,
Gaffs life—can always be redeemed from death;
And evil, in its nature, is decay.
And any hour can hit it all away.
The hopes that lie dead long, the distance seem,
May be the truer life, and this the dream.

THE GHOST IN THE CUPBOARD ROOM.

BY WILKIE COLLINS.

MR. BEARDY, or, as his friends gayly (as his friend and ally, Jack Governor, called it), turned out of an imaginary hamnock with the greatest promptitude, and very sleepily on duty. "At it's Sir Beaver's watch," said he, "there shall be no skulking." Jack looked at his watch and laughed, and admiring turn of his eye on Mr. Beaver, full of complimentary implications. I noticed, by the way, that Jack, in a moment of haste, put on that which he is greatly troubled at times, had his arm round my sister's waist. Perhaps that was a natural requirement of having buttons in the old nautical requirement of having something to hold on by.

Then were the terms of Mr. Beaver's revelation to us:

What I have got to put forward, will not take very long; and I shall beg leave to begin by going back to last night, when I left the time when we all parted from one another to go to bed.

The members of the convivial party did a very necessary and customary thing, last night—they each took a bedroom candlestick, and let the candle before they went to bed. I am not sure whether any one of them noticed that I left my candlestick untouched, and my candle unlighted; and went to bed, in a fashion of my own, of all the places in the world, in the dark? I don't think any one of them did.

That is, perhaps, rather curious to begin with. It is likewise curious, and at once, that I left the candle and the candlestick in the hands of this good company set me in a tremble, and most I bet might, and would, have thought it a night's good sleep. The fact of the matter is —and I give you leave, such as you please—that the ghost which haunted me last night, which has haunted me off and on, ever since, and which will which will go on haunting me till I am a ghost of him. And I am not a superstitious man, by myself (and consequently second to check her breath. And why not here. At first I could think to death? Grouting against the iron gate, she held
Her every breath against that, and prayed.
But nearer footsteps drew, then seemed to wait;
And then a voice she knew, calling the name
And saw the withered face, on which awoke
Joy at the sight of her, and then she spoke.
And asked the strangest question, "Sister Jo,"
She faltered, "Sister Monica, from sin,
Is she released?" And still she will not come;
Oh take us in, and let me die in peace!"
With scarcely words the tried sister met said,
Until she brought the key to unbar the gate.
The beggar tried to thank her as she knelt
And heard the echoing footsteps die away.
But what felt, when the cool cell was entered near,
And stirred strange trouble in her heart to hear
The voice that was to be her companion now?
A face that came from long, long years ago;
Yet, oh! how sad, how worn, how old!
The young and blooming, fleeting, fair, gone,
But a grave woman, gentle and serene.
The sweet sister lived—but she would have been.
But as she gazed and gazed, a radiance bright
Filled all the place with strangely mingled light;
The sun was there no longer, but instead,
A form with a circle round its head,
A ring of glory; and a face, so meek,
So soft, so tender, . . . Angela began to speak.
And stretched her hands out, crying, "Mary mild,
Mother of sorrows, and of God's own child,
And Mary sent . . . " But the sister's face
Showed how child's, witnesse home at last!
I filled the place. The light that was there,
For all thy daily duties I have done;
Thou knowest I have prayed, and sang, and slept;
Didst then not know, poor child, thy place was kept?
Kind hearts are here, yet were I not the tenderest one
Have hasten to its nurse? God has none.
And early forgiveness may be thy sad meed,
But yet he stoops to give it. More complete
Is love that has forgiveness for its need,
And pleads with thee to raise it. Only Heavven
Can pardon—only sympathy, then, to say For—
Rose hurried Sister Monica, but where
Was the poor beggar she left there? She was
Gone; and she searched in vain, and sought the place
Where she had knelt, but all was bare.
But only Angela at the gateway stood,
Laden with heavenly blessings, and with food.

And never did a day past by again,
But the old portress, with a sigh of pain,
Would murmur for her blessing: only a prayer
That the poor beggar, in her wild despair,
Might find her way back. "Oh, that I could find
Her, and bring her home!" she would then add.
But Angela bore her head, and said no more.
How pitiful her heart! And what was it
Something that directed the brightness of her face
After that day, and made her more than ever
But trouble—but a shadow—nothing more.

Years passed away. Then, one dark day of dread,
Saw all the convent bowing round a bed
Where Angela lay dying; every breath
Struggling beneath the heavy mark of death.
But suddenly a flush lit up her cheek,
Her raised hand was held, and she strove to speak.
So surprising was they listened; not a sound
Was heard, but Angela's voice, so sweet and clear.
The very tapers flames seemed newly stirred,
In such hushed awe the listeners heard.
And then they knew that Angela knelt in prayer.
Her sin, her flight; the sorrow and the strife,
And the return; and, then, the peace and calm,
"Praise God for me, my sisters!" and the pause
Rang up to heaven, far, and clear, and wild,
Again and yet again, then sank and died.
While her white face had such a smile of peace,
They saw not one need bend the music cease;
Then weeping sisters took her to her bench.
Crowned with a wreath of perfumed heather a bloom.

And thus the legend ended. It says
Something is hidden in the mystery
Besides the home, grief's proper place,
Never enough suffered, or asked, or known.
Have we not all, amid life's petty strife,

Among the Englishmen who were concerned in this Spanish-American business, I, your humble servant, happened, in a small way, to be one. It was then mute of a brig belonging to a certain firm in the City, which drove a sort of general trade, mostly in queer out-of-the-way places, as far from home as possible; and which freighted the brig, in the year I am speaking of, with a cargo of gunpowder for General Lopez and his volunteers. Nobody knew any thing about our instructions, when we sailed, except the captain; and he knew half more than he knew. I can't rightly say how many barrels of powder we had on board, or how much cash there was in it, only know we had no other cargo. The name of the brig was The Good Intent—a queer name for a craft that had to go to a vessel laden with gunpowder, and sent to help revolution. And as far as this particular voyage was concerned, it was a good deal more than for a joke, ladies and gentlemen, and I'm sorry to find you don't laugh at it.

The Good Intent was the craziest old tub of a vessel I ever went to sea in, and the worst found in all respects. She was a miserable and thirsty, or two hundred and eighty tons burden, I forget which; and she had a crew of eight men, all told, including every as we ought by rights to have had to work the brig. However, we were well and honestly manned, I believe; and we had to set that against the chance of foundering at sea, and on this occasion, indeed, the chance of being blown up on the bargain. In consideration of the nature of our cargo, we were harassed with very regulations as to what's at all like. We were to smoking our pipes and lighting our luncheons; and, as usual in such cases, the people who made the regulations preached what he didn't practice. Not a man of us was allowed to have a bit of lighted candle about when he went below at night—except the skipper; and he used his light, when he turned in, or when he had to look at the chart in his cabin, just as usual. This light was a common kitchen candle or "dip," of the sort that goes eight or nine to the pound, and it stood in an old battered flat candlestick, with all the japan worn and melted off it, in the fore part of the cabin. It would have been more seamanlike and suitable in every respect if he had had a lamp or a lantern; but such is his old-country fashion, and that same old candlestick, ladies and gentlemen, has ever afterward such to me. I hope, for the sake of the owners; and I'm much obliged to Miss Belinda in the corner for being good enough to laugh at it.

Well (I said "well" before, but it's a word that helps a man on like), we sailed in the brig, and had a fair wind and fine, for the Virgin Islands, in the West Indies; and, after sighting them, we had a fair wind to back to Cuba again, and then stood on due south, till the look-out at the masthead hailed the deck, and said he saw land. Then we knew we were off the coast of Venezuela. We had had a wonderful voyage so far. We had lost none of our crew by sickness, and a man of us had never harassed to death at the pumps. It wasn't often The Good Intent made such a voyage as that, I can tell you.

I was sent aloft to make sure about the land, and I did make sure about it. The skipper came up, came to the skipper, he went below, and had a look at his letter of instructions and the chart. Then he came on deck again. He ordered, of course a trifle to the eastward—I forget the point of the compass—and I don't matter. Enough for me to remember is, that it was dark before we closed in with the land. We kept the lead going, and we had to stand off from four to five leagues, or, or it might be six—I can't say for certain. I was off duty by-and-by with the watch, instead of as knowing how the currents ran on that coast. We all wondered why the skipper didn't anchor; but he didn't. He was on deck a night or two, or forecastle-mast-head, and wait for an answering light to shore. We saw no light, and nothing else appeared. It was starlight and calm. What little wind there was came in puffs off the land. I suppose we were drifting a little to the west ward, as I made it out, best part of an hour before the light appeared. It was a blue light, and seeing the light as shore, we saw a boat coming toward us, rowed by two men only.

We hailed them, and they answered, "Friends!" and hailed us by our name. They came on board. One of them was a Spaniard, and the other was a coffee-colored native pilot, who jabbered a little English. The Irishman handed a note to our skipper, who looked at it, and then, by candle-light on that part of the coast we were off then was not very fine by any means, and then he went on the spies of the enemy (that is to say, of the old governor) had been taken aboard the vessel, and he considered he was safe. We might trust the brig to the native pilot; and he had his instructions to go on to another part of the coast. The note was signed by the proper parties; so we let the Irishman go back alone in the boat, and allowed the native pilot to take lawful charge over the brig. He kept us stretching off from the land till noon the next day on different tacks, and then ordering him to keep us well out of sight of the shore. We only altered our course in the afternoon, so as to keep well out to sea during the night. The native pilot was given us by our instructions, we were bound to make the best of him. Near nightfall, however, with the best will in the world to avoid it, I was unlucky enough to quarrel with him. He wanted to go below with his pipe, and I stopped him, of course, because it was contrary to orders. Upon that, he tried to bustle by me, and I put him away with my hand. I never meant to push him down; but, somehow, I did. He picked himself up quick as lightning, and pulled out his knife. I snatched it out of his hand, slapped his murderous face for him, and threw his weapon overboard. He gave me one ugly look, and walked off. I didn't think much of the look then; but I remembered it a little too well afterward.

We were close in with the land again, just as the wind failed us, between eleven and twelve that night; and dropped our anchor in about three fathoms. It was pitch dark, and a dead, sirloes calm. The skipper was on deck with two of our best men for watch. The rest were taken below. The pilot, who coiled himself up, more like a snake than a man, was comfortable. He was provided with his four in the morning. But I didn't like the look of the night, or the pilot, or the state of things generally. I and I shook myself down in my hammock to get my nap there, and be ready for any thing at a moment's notice. I had a presentiment that the skipper whispering to me that he didn't like the look of things either, and that he would go below and consult his instructions and the chart. It is the last I remember, before the slow, heavy, regular roll of the old brig on the ground-swell rocked me off to sleep.

I was woke, ladies and gentlemen, by a scuffle and the forecastle, and a loud cry of murder. There was a man on my breast and a man on my legs; and I was thrown down on my back in the manner. The brig was in the hands of the Spaniards. They were swarming all over her. I heard six heavy splashes in the water, one after another—after the captain stabbed to the heart as he came running up with the companion—and I heard no more of the skipper. Except myself, every soul of us on board had been murdered and thrown into the sea. Yes, I'm sorry to tell it, but I couldn't help it. The pilot stoop over me with a lantern, and look, to make sure of me, and I shut my eyes and shut my head in his face, and he nodded his head at me, as much as to say, You were the man who hustled me and I'll remember you. Then he went off to play the game of cut and mouse with you in return for it!

I could neither move nor speak; but I could see the Spaniards take off the main hatch and begin to throw the powder on deck. It was a quarter of an hour afterward, I heard the sweeps of a schooner, or some small vessel, and the Spaniards and the pilot ceased their work. I heard a voice hail from the schooner, and the pilot answer. Then I heard the splash of the sweeps again, and the schooner came alongside. She was a long, low, black, frightful slow-match to the lightest candle alongside my face, and to fix it, in several folds, round the tallow dip, about a third of the distance down, measuring from the flame of the wick to the lip of the candlestick. He did that; he looked to see that my lashings were all safe; and then he put his face down close to mine, and whispered in my ear, "How up with the brig?"

He was so dark again the moment after; and he saw the two shoes shaved the hatch on over me. At the farthest end from where I lay, they had not fitted it down quite true, and I saw a blade of daylight glimmering in when I looked in that direction. I heard the sweeps of the schooner fall into the water—splash! splash! faster and faster; as they swept the vessel out in the broad calm, to be ready for the wind in the offing. Faster and faster, splash! splash! for a quarter of an hour or more.

While those sounds were in my ears, my eyes were fixed on the candle. It had been freshly lit —if left to itself it would burn for between six and seven hours—the slow-match was twisted round it about a third of the way down, and therefore the flame would be about two hours reaching it. There I lay gagged, bound, lashed to the floor; seeing my own life burning down with the candle by my side—doomed by slow fire, and doomed to be blown to atoms, and to see that doom coming on, sooner and sooner every moment fresh second of time, through sigh on two hours to come; powerless to help myself, and speechless to call for help to others. The wonder is now, that I don't chest the flame, the slow-match, and the powder, and die of the terror of it, in that crisis before my first half-hour was out in the hold of the brig.

I can't exactly say how long I kept the command of my senses after I had ceased to hear the splash of the schooner's sweeps in the water. I can trace back every thing I did and every thing I thought, up to a certain point; but, once past that, I get all abroad, and lose myself in confusion the moment when I lost myself in my own feelings at the time.

The moment the hatch was covered over me, I began, as every other man would have begun, in my place, with a fresh effort to free my right arm. In the mad panic I was in, I cut my flesh with the lashing—as if they had been knife-cuttings but I never stirred them. There was less chance still of freeing my legs, or of tearing myself from the fastenings that held me to the floor. As for me, when I was all but suffocated for want of breath. The gag, very small in the mouth, was a terrible enemy to me; I could only breathe freely through my nose—and that is but a poor vent when a man is straining his utmost as far as ever it will go.

I gave it up, and lay quiet, and got my breath again; my eyes glaring and straining at the candle all the time. While I was staring at it, the notion struck me of trying to blow out the flame by pumping a long breath at it suddenly through my nostrils. It was but a little chance, for the air blew from me, to be reached in that fashion. I tried, and tried, and tried—and then I gave in again and kept quiet again: always with my eyes glaring at the candle and the candle glaring at me. The system of the schemer's ways was very faint by this time. I could only just think them in the morning stillness. Splash! splash! —faster and faster—splash! splash!

Without exactly feeling my mind going, I became at last fully aware, as early as this, that the smell of the candle was growing taller and taller, and the length of tallow between the flame and the slow-match, which was the length of my life, was getting shorter and shorter. I calculated that I had rather less than an hour and a half to live. I was sure and sensible that I had a chance, in that time, of a boat pulling off to the help of the brig. Whether the vessel from which the vessel was anchored was in possession of our side, or in possession of the enemy's side, I made no sure that they must, somehow, have sent to hail the brig, merely because she was a stranger in those parts. Two questions—Who was, how song? The sun had not risen yet, as I could tell by looking through the chink in the hatch. The sun was the most welcome thing to me all knew, before the brig was seized, by seeing no lights on shore. There was no sun yet. I could tell by listening, to bring any strange vessel near. If I had had six hours to live, there might have been a chance for me, if vessels came from sunrise to noon. But with an hour and a half, which had dwindled to an hour and a quarter by this time—or, in other words, with the swiftness of the morning, the uninhabited coast, and the dead calm all against me—what chance for the ghost of a chance. As I felt that, I had another thought—my last—still more horrible; and only cut myself the deeper for my pains.

I gave in once more, and lay quiet, and listened for the splash of the sweeps. Splash! splash! A sound could I hear but the blowing of a fish, now and then, on the surface of the water, and I croak of the brig's crazy old spars, as she rolled gently from side to side with the little swell there was on the quiet water.

An hour and a quarter. The wick grew terribly, as the quarter slipped away, and the charred top of it began to thicken and spread out mushroom-shape. It would fall of soon. A coal would be reached, and would drop on one of the brig cast it over the side of the candle and let it down on the slow-match? I do not think I had about me a knife to live instead of an hour. This discovery set my mind for a minute on a new track altogether. I began speculating on myself what sort of a death blowing-up might be. Painful? Well, it would be, surely, too sudden for that. Perhaps one crash, inside me, or outside me, or both, and nothing more? Perhaps, and even a result that might catch and hold scattering of this living body of mine into millions of fiery sparks, might all happen in the same instant? I couldn't make it out; I couldn't settle how it would be. The minute of calmness in my mind left it, before I had half done thinking; and I got all abroad again.

When I came back to my thoughts, or when they came back to me (I can't say which), the wick was awfully tall, the flame was burning with a smoke above it, the charred top was broad and red, and heavily spreading out to its fall. My despair and horror at seeing it, took me in a new way, which was good and right, at any rate, for some part of the time. I said, in my own heart, you will understand, for the gag put all lip-praying out of my power, I tried, but the candle seemed to burn it up in me, struggled hard to force my eyes from the slow, murdering flame, and to look up through the chink in the hatch at the blessed daylight. I could only look down at it, look up. I fixed next only to shut my eyes, and keep them shut —one—two—and the second time I did it, I had God before me, and had the sense and the coolness to cut the match in two with his knife, before the flame had yet been burnt, before my eyes opened again, in spite of me, and the flame of the candle flew into them, flew all over me, and burnt up the rest of my thoughts in an instant.

I couldn't hear the fish blowing now; I couldn't hear the creak of the spars; I couldn't think; I couldn't feel the sweat of my own death agony in my face and body; I felt only the heavy, charred top of the wick. It swelled, tottered, bent over to one side, dropped—and in the moment of its fall—black and harmless, even before the swing of the brig had carried it over into the bottom of the hold—I was landlocked.

I caught myself laughing. Yes! laughing at the safe fall of the wick. But for the gag I should have screamed with laughing. As it was, I shook with it inside me—shook till the blood ran in my head, and I was all but suffocated for want of breath. I had just sense enough left to feel that my senses were going, and, after a fearful moment, was a sign of my brain going at last.

I had just sense enough left to make another struggle before my head broke loose with a frightened house, and ran away with me.

One continued effort to get a look of daylight through the hatch was what I tried for once more. I got it, and kept it, and made it do for me all else and to get that one look at daylight, was the hardest I had had yet; and I lost the fight. The flame had got to the match, and the lashings had hold of my hands. I couldn't look up from it. I couldn't even shut my eyes, when I tried that next, for the match followed. There was the wick, growing tall once more. There was the spark—no, not a spark between the light and the slow-match shortened to an inch, at last. Where was the use of trying to leave me? Three quarters of an hour? Half an hour? Fifty minutes? Twenty minutes? Already! an inch of slow-match could not last longer than twenty minutes. An inch of tallow! the notion of a man's body and soul being kept together by an inch of tallow! Ridiculous! Why, the greatest king that sits on a throne can't keep a grip on his power for twenty years; and here's an inch of tallow that can do what the king can't. There's something to tell mother, when I get home, which will surprise her more than all the rest of my voyages put together. Shipwreck! storm! fire! the loss of my chest! and shook and swelled and suffocated myself, till the light of the candle leaped in through my eyes, and licked up my thoughts—and burnt it out of me, and made me all empty, and cold, and quiet once more.

Mother and Lizzie. I don't know when they came back; but they did come back—not, as it seemed to me, into my head, but into my eyes, down bodily before me, in the hold of the brig.

Yes: into my eyes. There they were, in the light-hearted as usual, laughing at me. Laughing! Well, why not? Who is to blame Lizzie for thinking I'm lying on my bed-room floor, idle, with the best barrels all round me? Nobody's to blame, my sweetheart, round and round in a fiery mist, wringing her hands, screeching out for help—faster and faster, like the splash of the sweeps—splash! splash! burst up in the fiery mist. Mist? fire? no: Lizzie and mother, laughing, and standing on the light—mother knitting, with ten flaming points at the ends of her fingers and thumbs, and slow-match instead of wool; Lizzie with her face instead of her own gray hair. Mother in her old dress, grey—Lizzie in her old dress, hands hanging over the back of the chair, dripping with gunpowder. No! no gunpowder, no flame, no match—only a fiery mist, and a fiery, shining red-hot, like a sun, in the fiery mist; turning upside down in the fiery mist, backward and forward along the slow-match, in the fiery mist; spinning millions of miles in a minute, in the fiery mist—splash! splash! faster and smaller into one tiny point, and that point lighting on a fiery mist—splash! splash! and then, all fire and splash—no hearing, no seeing, no thinking, no feeling—the brig, the sea, my own self, the whole world, all gone together!

After what I've just told you, I know nothing. I shall remember pretty much what I've told you, if I seemed to me in a comfortable bed, with two rough and ready men like myself sitting on each side of my pillow, and my two messengers, Lizzie watching me at the foot of the bed. It was about seven in the morning. My sleep (or what seemed like my sleep to me) had lasted better than eight months—I was smong my own countrymen in the old world, all going well—and each side of my pillow were my keepers, torn and ragged, and dressed in the roughest rags, at the foot of the bed was the doctor. What I said and did in those eight months, I never have known and never shall know. All I can tell is, that it had been one long sleep—that's all I know.

It was another two months or more before the doctor thought it safe to answer the questions I asked him.

The brig had been anchored, just as I had supposed, off a part of the coast which was lonely enough to make the Spaniards pretty sure of no interruption, so long as they managed their murderous work quietly under cover of night. My life had not been saved from the wreck, but from the sea. An American vessel, becalmed in the offing, had made out the brig as the sun rose; and the captain, having his time on his hands in consequence of the calm, had sent in my own heart, you will understand, for the gag put all lip-praying out of my power. I tried, but the candle seemed to burn it up in me, struggled hard to force my eyes from the slow, murdering flame, and to look up through the chink in the hatch at the blessed daylight. I could only look down at it, look up. I fixed next only to shut my eyes, and keep them shut —one—two—and the second time I did it, I had God before me, and had the sense and the coolness to cut the match in two with his knife, before the flame had yet been burnt, before my eyes opened again, in spite of me, and the flame of the candle flew into them, flew all over me, and burnt up the rest of my thoughts in an instant.

I couldn't hear the fish blowing now; I couldn't hear the creak of the spars; I couldn't think; I couldn't feel the sweat of my own death agony in my face and body; I felt only the heavy, charred top of the wick. It swelled, tottered, bent over to one side, dropped—and in the moment of its fall—black and harmless, even before the swing of the brig had carried it over into the bottom of the hold—I was landlocked.

I caught myself laughing. Yes! laughing at the safe fall of the wick. But for the gag I should have screamed with laughing. As it was, I shook with it inside me—shook till the blood ran in my head, and I was all but suffocated for want of breath. I had just sense enough left to feel that my senses were going, and, after a fearful moment, was a sign of my brain going at last.

I had just sense enough left to make another struggle before my head broke loose with a frightened house, and ran away with me.

One continued effort to get a look of daylight through the hatch was what I tried for once more. I got it, and kept it, and made it do for me all else and to get that one look at daylight, was the hardest I had had yet; and I lost the fight. The flame had got to the match, and the lashings had hold of my hands. I couldn't look up from it. I couldn't even shut my eyes, when I tried that next, for the match followed. There was the wick, growing tall once more. There was the spark—no, not a spark between the light and the slow-match shortened to an inch, at last. Where was the use of trying to leave me? Three quarters of an hour? Half an hour? Fifty minutes? Twenty minutes? Already! an inch of slow-match could not last longer than twenty minutes. An inch of tallow! the notion of a man's body and soul being kept together by an inch of tallow! Ridiculous! Why, the greatest king that sits on a throne can't keep a grip on his power for twenty years; and here's an inch of tallow that can do what the king can't. There's something to tell mother, when I get home, which will surprise her more than all the rest of my voyages put together. Shipwreck! storm! fire! the loss of my chest! and shook and swelled and suffocated myself, till the light of the candle leaped in through my eyes, and licked up my thoughts—and burnt it out of me, and made me all empty, and cold, and quiet once more.

Mother and Lizzie. I don't know when they came back; but they did come back—not, as it seemed to me, into my head, but into my eyes, down bodily before me, in the hold of the brig.

Yes: into my eyes. There they were, in the light-hearted as usual, laughing at me. Laughing! Well, why not? Who is to blame Lizzie for thinking I'm lying on my bed-room floor, idle, with the best barrels all round me? Nobody's to blame, my sweetheart, round and round in a fiery mist, wringing her hands, screeching out for help—faster and faster, like the splash of the sweeps—splash! splash! burst up in the fiery mist. Mist? fire? no: Lizzie and mother, laughing, and standing on the light—mother knitting, with ten flaming points at the ends of her fingers and thumbs, and slow-match instead of wool; Lizzie with her face instead of her own gray hair. Mother in her old dress, grey—Lizzie in her old dress, hands hanging over the back of the chair, dripping with gunpowder. No! no gunpowder, no flame, no match—only a fiery mist, and a fiery, shining red-hot, like a sun, in the fiery mist; turning upside down in the fiery mist, backward and forward along the slow-match, in the fiery mist; spinning millions of miles in a minute, in the fiery mist—splash! splash! faster and smaller into one tiny point, and that point lighting on a fiery mist—splash! splash! and then, all fire and splash—no hearing, no seeing, no thinking, no feeling—the brig, the sea, my own self, the whole world, all gone together!

After what I've just told you, I know nothing. I shall remember pretty much what I've told you, if I seemed to me in a comfortable bed, with two rough and ready men like myself sitting on each side of my pillow, and my two messengers, Lizzie watching me at the foot of the bed. It was about seven in the morning. My sleep (or what seemed like my sleep to me) had lasted better than eight months—I was smong my own countrymen in the old world, all going well—and each side of my pillow were my keepers, torn and ragged, and dressed in the roughest rags, at the foot of the bed was the doctor. What I said and did in those eight months, I never have known and never shall know. All I can tell is, that it had been one long sleep—that's all I know.

It was another two months or more before the doctor thought it safe to answer the questions I asked him.

The brig had been anchored, just as I had supposed, off a part of the coast which was lonely enough to make the Spaniards pretty sure of no interruption, so long as they managed their murderous work quietly under cover of night. My life had not been saved from the wreck, but from the sea. An American vessel, becalmed in the offing, had made out the brig as the sun rose; and the captain, having his time on his hands in consequence of the calm, had sent in a vessel anchored where no vessel had any reason to be, had manned one of his boats and sent his mate with it, and a little closer into the matter, and bring back a report of what he saw. What he saw was, by and his men found the brig deserted and boarded her, was a gleam of hope enough for the chink in the hatchway. The flame was within about a thread's length of the slow-match, when he lowered himself into the hold, and cut me and the sweeps and cordages we perceived it must be kept a secret from Miss Griffin. It was because we knew Miss Griffin to be bereft of human sympathies, and incapable of appreciating the greatness of the great Harmon. Mystery impenetrably shrouded from Miss Griffin, then, let us intrust it to Miss Bule.

We were ten in Miss Griffin's establishment by Hampstead Ponds—eight ladies and two gentlemen. Miss Bule, whom I judge to have attained the ripe age of eight or nine, took the shine in society. I opened the subject to her in the course of the day, and proposed that she should become the Favorite.

Miss Bule, after struggling with the diffidence so natural to, and charming in, her adorable sex, expressed herself as flattered by the idea, but wished to know how it was proposed to provide for Miss Fipson? Mr. Bule, I may as well mention, had never vowed toward that young lady a friendship, halves, and no secrets, and sought at the Church Service and Lonzone complete in two volumes with ease and lock.—Miss Bule said she could not, as the friend of Fipson, slaughter from herself, or me, that Fipson was not one of the common.

Now, Miss Fipson, having early light hair and blue eyes (which was my idea of any thing moral and luminous that was called Fairy), I promptly replied that I regarded Miss Fipson in the light of a Fair Circassian.

"And what then?" Miss Bule pensively asked.

I replied that she must be inveigled by a Mechanic, brought to me veiled, and proclaimed as a slave.

The other creature had already fallen into the second row of chairs in the State, and was apart for Grand Vizier. He afterward resisted this dispersion of events, but had to yield pulsely until he yielded.

"Shall I not be jealous?" Miss Bule inquired, setting down her eyes.

"Zdeicide, no," I replied; "you will ever be the favorite Sultana in the State of my heart, and on my throne, will be ever yours."

Miss Bule, upon that assurance, consented to propound the idea to her sister Sultanas, slaughter pansions. It occurring to me, in the course of the same day, that we were about to erect a graining and good-natured soul called Tabby, who was the serving drudge of the house, and had no more figure than one of the beds, and upon whose face there was always more or less black lead, I slyly, into Miss Bule's ear, let her operate a little note to that effect: dwelling on the black lead as being in a manner deposited by the forges of Pyrrhus in painting Tabby out for Mezenos, the celebrated chief of the Blacks of the Haram.

There were difficulties in the formation of the desired institution, as there are in all combinations. The other creatures showed himself of a low character, and, when I declined to appeal to the throne, pretended to have conscientious scruples about granting Fipson the title of the Calif; wouldn't call him Commander of the Faithful; spoke of him slightingly; and became virtually as a body, "Jane" said he, the other creature, "wouldn't play." Play!—and was otherwise coarse and unfeminine. The most violent of disposition was, however, put down by the general indignation of a united Seraglio, and I became blessed in the smiles of sight of the fairest of the daughter of men.

The smiles could only be bestowed when Miss Griffin was looking another way, and only then in a very wary manner, for the spirit of the Blue followed the footsteps of the Prophet that the saw with a little round ornament in the middle of the pattern on the back of her head. But, every day after dinner, for an hour, we were all together, and then the Favorite and the rest of the Royal Harem encompassed who should most beguile the leisure of the Serene Haroun repassing from the scenes of business and pleasure generally, as in most affairs of State, of an ambitious character, the Commander of the Faithful being a fearful boggler at a love-tale.

On these occasions, the devoted Mesrour, chief of the Blacks of the Haram, was present in attendance (Miss Griffin usually ringing for that office, at the same time, with great vehemence), but never acquitted himself in a manner worthy of his historical reputation. In the first place, his bringing a broom into the Divan at the end of it, even when Haroun wore on his shoulders the red robe of anger (Miss Pipson's pelisse), though it might be got over for the moment, was felt to be quite satisfactorily accounted for. In the second place, his bawling out "Bismillah!" and exclamations of "Look you pretties!" was neither Eastern nor respectful. In the third place, when specially instructed to say "Bismillah!" he always said "Hallelujah!" This officer, unlike his kin clan, was too good-humored altogether, and his mouth open far too wide, expressed approbation to an incongruous extent, and every one—as it was the business of the parties—of the Fair Circassian for five hundred thousand purses of gold, and cheap, accumulated the love of the Favorite, and the Calif, all round. (Parenthetically let me say Gold Mines, Incorporated, and there have been mines and daughters on that tender bosom, softening many a hard day since!)

Miss Griffin was a model of propriety, and I am at a loss to imagine what the feelings of the virtuous woman would have been, had she known, when she paraded us down the Hampstead-road two and two, that she was walking with a traitor on the head of Mesrour and Mohammedanism. I believe that a mysterious and terrible joy with which the contemplation of Miss Griffin, in this unconscious state, inspired us, and a grim sense prevalent among us that there was a dreadful power in our knowledge of what Miss Griffin (who knew all things that could be learnt out of book) didn't know, were the mainspring of the preservation of our secret. It was wonderfully kept, but was once upon the verge of self-betrayal, by the flight and escape occurred upon a Sunday. We were all ten ranged in a conspicuous part of the gallery at church, with Miss Griffin at our head walked me back to the palace in a sort of state; but not at all (as I couldn't help feeling with discontinent) in culprit state.

When we got there, we went into a room by ourselves, and Miss Griffin called in to her assistance Mesrour, chief of the dusky guards of the Haram, who, however, in this instance, began to shed tears.

"Bless you, my precious!" said that officer, turning to Miss Pipson's cat, "your Pa's took bitter bad!"

I asked, with a fluttered heart, "Is he very ill?"

"Lord temper the wind to you, my lamb!" said the good Mesrour, kneeling down, that I might look a comforting shoulder for my head to rest on, "your Pa's dead!"

Miss Griffin's cat took to flight at the words; the Seraglio vanished; from that moment I never again saw one of the eight of the fairest of the daughter of men.

I was taken home, and there was Debt at home as well as Death, and we had a sale directly. My own little bed was so superciliously looked upon by a Power unknown to me, hardly called upon by a Power, that a brass coal-scuttle, a rocking-jack, and a bird-cage, were obliged to be put into it to make a Lot of it, and then it went for a song. So I heard mentioned, and I wondered what song, and thought what a dismal song it must be to sell for so little.

Then, I was sent to a great, cold, bare school of Dr. Birch's, where every thing to eat and drink was thick and clumpy, without being enough; where every body, large and small, was cruel to every body, and all about the sale before I got there, and asked me what I had fetched, and who had fetched it, and looked at me, and said, "Going, going, gone!" I never whispered in that wretched place that I had been Haroun, and the Favorite, and Mesrour, for that if I mentioned my reverses, I should be so worried, that I should be glad to throw myself into the deepest pool in the playground, which looked like the best.

Ah me! ah me! No other ghost has haunted the boy's room, my friends, since I have occupied it, than the ghost of my own childhood, the ghost of my own innocence, the ghost of my own airy belief. Many a time have I pursued my phantom since—at this man's stride at mine to come up with it, never with these man's hands of mine to grasp it, never more to touch a heart of mine to hold it in its purity. And here you see me working out, as cheerfully and thankfully as I can, my doom of toiling at the glass a constant change of customers, and of lying down and rising with the skeleton substitute for my marital companion.

THE GHOST IN THE GARDEN ROOM.

BY MRS. GASKELL.

My friend and solicitor rubbed his bony forehead—which, with Shakespeare—with his hand, after a manner he has when I consult him professionally, and took a very large pinch of snuff. "Indeed, Sir," said he, "has been haunted by the Ghost of a Judge."

"Of a Judge?" echoed the company.

"Of a Judge. In his wig and robes as he sits upon the Bench, at Assize-time. At his table, in the Grand Jury-room chair at the side of my fire, when we have all retired for the night to our respective rooms, and have gone to bed. I never shall forget the description he gave me, and I never have forgotten it since I first heard it.

"Then you have seen and heard him before, Mr. Underby?" said my sister.

"Often."

"Consequently, he is not peculiar to one locality?"

"By no means. He returns to me in many intervals of quiet leisure, and his story haunts me."

We one and all called for the story, that it might haunt us likewise.

"It fell within the range of his judicial experience," said my friend and solicitor, "and was the Judge's manner of summing it up."

Those words did not apply, of course, to the actual pinch of snuff he mentioned then, but to the words that followed the great pinch of snuff.

They were these:

Not many years after the beginning of this century, a worthy couple of the name of Gurnard occupied a small farm in the North Riding of Yorkshire. They had married late in life, and although they were not young when their only son Benjamin, who was perfection in their eyes, was a boy of about seven years old, they naturally people have a child of uncommon beauty; but it is sometimes, and Benjamin Honeyrod was one of those exceptional children. A sturdy-working, labor and care-marked farmer, and the mother, who could never have been more than active girl; a daily comfort to her uncle and aunt. She was so much a darling in the household that there was no hunting-field for their only son Benjamin, who was perfection in their eyes. Yes, it was difficult to account for Benjamin's having process of time, might bring other dear ones to share their love.

But Benjamin took it all very coolly. He had been sent to a day-school in the neighboring town—a grammar-school, in the high state of neglect in which the majority of such schools were thirty years ago. Neither his father nor his mother knew much of learning. All that they knew (and that limited their choice of a school) was, that they could not, by any possibility, teach their darling to a knowledge-school: that some schooling he must have, and that Squire Pollexfen's son went to Highminster Grammar School, to Squire Pollexfen's son many another son destined to make his parents' hearts ache, were to this end school. If he had been so utterly bad a piece of education, the simple farmer and his wife might have found it out sooner. But not only did the pupils thrive learn vice, they also learned deceit. Benjamin was naturally not clever to many degrees below else, if he had chosen so to be, there was nothing in Highminster Grammar School to hinder his being a dunce of the first water. But in all appearance he grew clever and gentlemanlike. His father and mother were very proud of his airs and graces when he came home for the holidays; taking them for proofs of his refinement, although the practised effect of such refinement was to make him express his contempt for his parents' homely ways and simple pleasures. By the time he was eighteen—an articled clerk in an attorney's office at Highminster, for he had quite declined succeeding to mere cloddishness," that is to say, a hard-working, honest farmer like his father—Benjamin Rose could persuade no less to his pretty cousin Bessy Rose. He cared just enough for her to make this work of necessity not disagreeable at the time he was making love to her. But he found it tiresome to remember her little claims upon him when she was no longer present. The letters he had promised her during his weekly absences at Highminster, the trifling commissions she had asked him to do for her were all considered in the light of troubles; and even when he was with her he remembered not the quiries she made as to his mode of passing his time, or what female acquaintances he had in Highminster.

When his apprenticeship was ended, nothing would serve him but that he must go up to London for a year or two. Poor Farmer Hautroy was beginning to repent of his ambition of making his son Benjamin a gentleman. He was too late to repine now. Both father and mother felt this, and, however sorrowful they might be, they were silent, neither demurring nor assenting to Benjamin's proposition when first he made it. But Bessy, though her mother noticed that both her uncle and aunt seemed unusually tired that night, and had hardly anything to say, rattled about among the supper things as she put them away after Benjamin's departure, and made more noise than—as if noise and bustle was what she needed to keep her from bursting out crying—and, lastly, as one hope after another, taken in the position and looks of Nathan and Hester, she avoided looking at them altogether, for fear the sight of their wistful faces should make her own tears overflow.

"Sit down, boy—sit down!" said Hester. Bring the creepie-stool to the fireside, and let's have a bit of talk over the lad's plans," said Nathan, at last, compelled to speak. Bessy came and sat down in front of the fire, and threw her apron over her face, as she rested her elbows on both hands. Nathan felt as if it was a chance which of the two women bore out most his grief. So he thought to watch the words spoken, in hopes of keeping off the infliction of tears.

"Didst ever hear of this mad plan afore, Bessy?"

"No, never!" Her voice came muffled, and changed from under her apron. Hester felt that if the tone, both of question and answer, implied blame, and this she could not bear.

"We should ha' looked to it when we bound him, for of necessity it must ha' come to this. Times's economical, and catechisms, and I dunno what all for him to be put through in London. It's not his line."

"Which one us said it were?" asked Nathan, rather put out. "That, for that matter, it wreck would carry him over the sea, and make him as good a lawyer as any judge among 'em. God Lawzon, the attorney, told me same. I'll talk I had wi' him a bit sin. Na, na! it's the lad's own hankering after London that makes him want for to stay there for a year, let alone two."

Nathan shook his head.

"And if it be his own hankering," said Bessy, putting down her apron, her face all aflame, and her eyes swollen up, "I dunnos see why he should n't. Lads aren't like lasses, to be tied to their own fireside like th' crook yonder. It's fitting for a young man to go abroad, and see the world afore he settles down."

Hester's hand sought Bessy's, and the two women sat in sympathetic defiance of any blame that should be thrown on the beloved absent. Nathan only said:

"Nay, wench, dunna wax up so; whatten's done, 's done; and wowse, it's my doing. I mun ha' needs made my bairn a gentleman; and we mun pay for it."

"Dear uncle! he wunna spend much, I'll answer for it; and I'll scrimp and save i' th' house to make it good."

"Wench!" said Nathan, solemnly, "it were not paying in coult I were speaking on: it were paying in heart's care, and heaviness of soul. Lonnun is a place where the devil keeps court as well as King George; and my poor chap has more nor once welly fallen into his clutches here. I dunno what he'll do when he's left to his own sniff of him."

"Don't let him go, father!" said Hester, for the first time taking this view. Hitherto she had only thought of her own grief at parting with him. "Don't let him think so, keep him here, safe under our own eye."

"Nay!" said Nathan, "it's a bit past time o' life for that. Why, there's not one on us knows where he is at this present time, and it's too late to repine now. Both father and mother, as I'm town like, wi' a wife that's mean to me for the last twenty minute. And, we coud folk, as we get into years, must gi' up farm, and tak a bit on a house; and we'll be nigher him."

And so the good Nathan, his own heart heavy enough, tried to comfort his womenkind. That, of the three, his eyes were longest in closing, his apprehensions the deepest founded.

"I misdoubt me he's mixed up wi' th' lads! I misdoubt me sore," was the thought that kept him awake half the night long. "Benjamin's wrong about him, or folk would an look at us wi' such piteous-like ons when they speak on him. I can read 'em, I can read 'em. I'll no proud to let on. And Lawzon, too, he holds his tongue more than he's wont for a man as has his say, my lad's getting on, and whatten sort of a lawyer he'll mak. Good he mun clod to Hester or me, if he's minded to see th' Lord Mayor full! But methy it's this lying waking a' the night through that makes me so fanciful. Why, when I were his age, I dare be bound I should ha' spent money fast enough, if I could ha' come by it. But I'm getting old, I'm sure I'm grow differ'. Well! it were hard to thwart th' child of our old age, and we waiten so long for to have it!"

Next morning Nathan rode to Bessy the carrier's house, Benjamin's ex-nurse. Mrs. Lawson. Any body who saw him ride out of his own yard would have been struck by the change in his appearance since he returned; a change which more than a day's unusual exercise should have made in a man of his years. He seemed to have aged all at once. Our jerk of Moggy's head would have plunged her into a gallop; but Nathan, as he went forward, his eyes looking on some unseen thing, with long nawnking gaze. But as he drew near Bessy's door, he pulled up as he afore to recover himself.

"No need to trouble them," he said; "Isds will be lads. But I didna think he had it in him to be so shootless, young as he is. Well, well! Spoilt people mose vexatious. Eh! they're crazy ways, it's best to cut him off fra such evil lads as Will Hawker, and such-like. He'll be glad enough to be let astray. He were a good chap till he knowed them—a good chap till he knowed them."

But he put all his cares in the back-ground when he came into Bessy's house. Mrs. Lawson, Bessy's mother, his wife met him at the door, and both would fain lend a hand to take off his great-coat.

"Theer, wench, theer! ye might let a man alone for to get out on's leather. Eh, Mrs. Lingate [she was a widow], how's yourself? and how's all ways, it's best to cut him off fra such evil lads as Will Hawker, and such-like. He'll be glad enough to be let astray. He were a good chap till he knowed them—a good chap till he knowed them."

But he put all his cares in the back-ground when he came into Bessy's house. Mrs. Lawson, Bessy's mother, his wife met him at the door, and both would fain lend a hand to take off his great-coat.

"Theer, wench, theer! ye might let a man alone for to get out on's leather. Eh, Mrs. Lingate [she was a widow], how's yourself? and how's all the folk? Ye mayn't be a-going to undress, I hope, for I'm but a bit on my road. Nay, I'll step into the house, and see Bessy myself."

"Nay!" said Mrs. Lawson, "it's but time o' life for that. Why, there's not one on us knows where he is at this present time, and it's too late to repine now. Both father and mother, as I'm town like, wi' a wife that's mean to me for the last twenty minute. And, we coud folk, as we get into years, must gi' up farm, and tak a bit on a house; and we'll be nigher him."

And so the good Nathan, his own heart heavy enough, tried to comfort his womenkind. That, of the three, his eyes were longest in closing, his apprehensions the deepest founded.

"I misdoubt me he's mixed up wi' th' lads! I misdoubt me sore," was the thought that kept him awake half the night long. "Benjamin's wrong about him, or folk would an look at us wi' such piteous-like ons when they speak on him. I can read 'em, I can read 'em. I'll no proud to let on. And Lawzon, too, he holds his tongue more than he's wont for a man as has his say, my lad's getting on, and whatten sort of a lawyer he'll mak. Good he mun clod to Hester or me, if he's minded to see th' Lord Mayor full! But methy it's this lying waking a' the night through that makes me so fanciful. Why, when I were his age, I dare be bound I should ha' spent money fast enough, if I could ha' come by it. But I'm getting old, I'm sure I'm grow differ'. Well! it were hard to thwart th' child of our old age, and we waiten so long for to have it!"

Next morning Nathan rode Moggy the carrier's beast into Highminster, to see Mr. Lawzon. Any body who saw him ride out of his own yard would have been struck by the change in his appearance since he returned; a change which more than a day's unusual exercise should have made in a man of his years. He seemed to have aged all at once. Our jerk of Moggy's head would have plunged her into a gallop; but Nathan, as he went forward, his eyes looking on some unseen thing, with long nawnking gaze. But as he drew near Bessy's door, he pulled up as he afore to recover himself.

"No need to trouble them," he said; "Isds will be lads. But I didna think he had it in him to be so shootless, young as he is. Well, well! Spoilt people mose vexatious. Eh! they're crazy ways, it's best to cut him off fra such evil lads as Will Hawker, and such-like. He'll be glad enough to be let astray. He were a good chap till he knowed them—a good chap till he knowed them."

But he put all his cares in the back-ground when he came into Bessy's house. Mrs. Lawson, Bessy's mother, his wife met him at the door, and both would fain lend a hand to take off his great-coat.

"Theer, wench, theer! ye might let a man alone for to get out on's leather. Eh, Mrs. Lingate [she was a widow], how's yourself? and how's all the folk? Ye mayn't be a-going to undress, I hope, for I'm but a bit on my road. Nay, I'll step into the house, and see Bessy myself."

"How's my eyes changed sin last thou sawst them," she asked, "that thou mont be telling me about 'em i' that fashion? I'll rayther by a dusk see thee helping the mother when she's dropped her knitting-needle and canna see i' th' dark to pick it up."

But Bessy thought of his pretty speech about her eyes long after he had forgotten making it, and would have been puzzled to tell the color of them. Many a day, after he was gone, did she look earnestly in the little oblong looking-glass, which hung up against the wall of her little sloping-roofed room, and she used to take down in order to examine the eyes he had praised, murmuring to herself, "Pretty soft grey eyes I 've got, they 're!" until she would hang up the glass again with a sudden laugh and a blush.

In the days when he had gone away to the vacue distance and vapper place—the city called London—Benjamin had forgot all that had gone against her feeling of the affection and duty that is on every side his portion, and she had many things to forget of this kind that would keep surging up into her mind. For instance, she wished that he had not objected to her, in the spare, home-made shirts which his mother and she had had such pleasure in getting ready for him. He might not know, it was true—and so her love urged—how carefully and evenly the stitches had been taken, how, content with blessing the yarn in the sunniest meadow, the linen, in its return home, had been gently spread out afresh on the sweet summer grass, and watched carefully night after night when there was no dew to protect it from kindly effect. He did not know—for no one but Bessy herself did—how many times the stitches were taken out and false by her aunt's failing eyes (why if not to do the choicest part of the stitching all by her self), Bessy hiding them away in her own room, and with dainty fingers but restitching the wrong parts in the night. All this he did not know, or he could never have complained of the coarse texture of the linen, and the clumsy make; and urged on his mother to give him part of her little store of egg and butter money to buy him a few handkerchiefs and linen in Highminster.

When once that little precious store of his mother's was appropriated, it was well for Bessy's peace of mind that she did not know how long, and how anxiously she spun the coins, counting guineas for shillings, or just the other way, so that the amount was seldom the same at any two successive countings; and urged on his mother to give him part of her little store of egg and butter money to buy him a few handkerchiefs and linen in Highminster.

When once that little precious store of his mother's was appropriated, it was well for Bessy's peace of mind that she did not know how long, and how anxiously she spun the coins, counting guineas for shillings, or just the other way, so that the amount was seldom the same at any two successive countings; and urged on his mother to give him part of her little store of egg and butter money to buy him a few handkerchiefs and linen in Highminster.

When once that little precious store of his mother's was appropriated, it was well for Bessy's peace of mind that she did not know how long, and how anxiously she spun the coins, counting guineas for shillings, or just the other way, so that the amount was seldom the same at any two successive countings; and urged on his mother to give him part of her little store of egg and butter money to buy him a few handkerchiefs and linen in Highminster.

Yet this son, this hope, this love, had yet a strange power of fascination over the homeward heart. The evening before he left, he sat between his parents, a hand in theirs on either side, and Bessy sat on the carpet at his feet, with her lap on his aunt's knee, and looking up at him from time to time, as if to learn his face by heart, with his glances, meeting which made her drop her eyes, and only sigh.

He supped on that night with his father, long after the women had gone to bed. But not to sleep; for I will answer for it the grey dawn found them sitting a while till the first dawn of the autumn day, and Bessy heard her uncle come up stairs to his wife's room, and then, as if resolved to crown his gift with liberality. Another long parley ensued, which she could not distinctly hear continued words, it might have been advice, it might be a prayer, for it was in the tone of voice in which Hester and son ended up to bed. Bessy's room was but parted from her cousin's by a thin wall, and sometimes she thought she had distinctly heard, before her eyes, tired out with crying, closed themselves in sleep, words she guessed to be coming down upon Hester in regular intervals, as if Benjamin were playing an opera air on his aunt's father's pocket-comb.

After he was gone, Bessy wished he had asked her to walk part of the way with him into Highminster. But when he had risen first and soon after in the bed, but she could not accompany him without invitation.

The whole household tried to close over the gap as best they might. They seemed to get through more work with less apparent energy; but somehow when evening came, there had been a blank in the day, what with omitted and half work, and there was no telling how much care and anxiety each had had to bear in secret for the rest. Nathan wheel, or in the shed. Formerly he was looked for every Saturday, looked for by Bessy, every one looked for, if he were, there were things to be spoken about, that made his visit any thing but a pleasure: still he was come, and those things might go right, and then what sunshine, what gladness to those humble people, when he was away! Even the winter was come on; old folks' sight fails, and the evenings were long, and sad, to any one of them could do or say. But he did not write so often as he might—so every one thought, though every one was afraid of his ready to defend him from either of the others who had expressed such a thought aloud. Bessy, "and it's by herself, when the first primroses peeped out in a sheltered and sunny bank, or the first cuckoo-flower threw a delicate lilac from afternoon church—"surely there never will be such a dreary miserable winter again as last year." There had been a great change in Nathan and Bessy Hautroy during this last year. The spring before, when Benjamin was yet the subject of more hopes than fears, his father and mother looked what I may call an elderly middle-aged couple: people who had a good deal of hearty work in them yet. Now—it was not his absence alone that caused the change—they looked frail and old, as if each day's natural trouble was a burden more than they could bear. For Nathan had heard sad reports about his only child, and had told them solemnly to his wife, as things too bad to be believed, and yet, "God help us if indeed he is such a bad as this!" Their eyes were become too dry and hollow for many tears; they sat together, hand in hand; and shivered, and sighed, and did not speak many words, or dare to look at each other; and then Hester had said,

"We mauna tell th' lass. Young folks' hearts break wi' a little, and she'd be apt to fancy it were true." Here the old woman's voice broke into a kind of singing cry, but it subsided, and her next words were all slight: "We mauna tell her! he's bound to be frank wi' his mother, if he thinks well on him, and loves him, it will bring him straight."

"God grant it!" said Nathan.

"God shall grant it," said Hester, passionately, beginning to use words: and then suppressing them, also! with a vain repetition.

But a fresh piece for lying, in Highminster, it said she, at length, as if impatient of the silence. "I never knowed such a place for getting up cracks. Bad people know known one another, and nother you nor nobe's on: that's one blessing."

For, all that was said in their hearts before them, how came they to look so sad, and worn, beyond what mere age could do?

Another month passed away, another winter, yet more miserable than the last. This year, with the prisoners, and the hospitals, and bad, ripped young man, with yet enough of specious manners and handsome countenance to make his appearance striking in the house to whom the aspect of a London fest young man in the lowest grade of society was new. He sat at first, as he sauntered in with a swagger and an air of indifference, which was partly assumed, and partly real, and all queried from a certain kind of awe of him, as if he were not their son, but a real gentleman; but they soon felt that this instinct in their homely natures not to know, after a very few minutes had passed, that this was not the case.

"Whatten ever does he mean," said Hester to her husband, after the first visit, "coming for a' them meals and wenchoke? And he minces his words as if his tongue were clipped short, for all he's so magnific." "Whatten ever is he bad as a bot day'r August for spoiling good victual?" said Nathan, as a cloud came on his wont up; and now, look at him, with his skin gone into lines and flourishes, just like first page in a printed book.

"I think he looks a deal better, aunt, for them new-fashioned clothes," said Bessy, trying—trying still at the remembrance of the kiss he had given her on first seeing her—a pledge, she thought, for the future, that in spite of his change for better-writing, he still looked upon her as his playfellow still. There was a certain fashion which none of them liked, although they never spoke about them, yet there was also something that was admired in it, and that is to be remarked quiet at Nob-end, instead of seeking society, as he had been wont to do, in the ever-healing off to the neighboring town. His father had paid all the debts that he had left behind him, and Benjamin had gone up to London; so there were no dues that his pursuits knew of to alarm him, and he was left in peace. But Nathan used out in the morning with the old man, his father, and lounged by his side. Nathan wondered to see the old man's life pass away in such a manner, and stood patiently by his side, while he hewed down the small oaklings with the great short-sworn looming over his neighbor's hedge.

"Thou mayst as well say, thou, what's all being th' milk: folk don't care whether it's good or not, so that they get their price from the grocer wench! I sometimes think that's be for giving up th' law, and taking to th' coal trade, and look at them lads, that's a connection; and the farm, and the stock, and the clean wife, too, were ready to his hand; and Nathan could stick to it up on himself nerves. And, after unguarded moments, to reproach his son with the handsomely handsome that had been given to his education. So the old man listened with painful interest to the answer which his son returned, and which seemed to make coughing a little and blowing his nose before he spoke.

"I'm not clear," said he, "as a precarious livelihood; a man, as I may express myself, his own master in the profession unless he is content to submit to the judges, and tiptop barristers, and that sort of thing. Now you see my mother and me have been considering that you had as well exactly in that line. But luckily I have met with a man, a friend as I may say, who is really a first-rate fellow, knowing every body, from the Lord Chancellor downward: and he has offered me a share in his business—a partnership at there—" He hesitated a little.

"I'm sure that's uncommon kind of the gentleman," said Nathan. "I should like for to thank him myself; for it's not many as would pick up a young chap out o' th' dirt as it were, and say, 'Here's hand my good fortune for you, sir, and your very good health.' Most on 'em, when they're gettin' a bit o' luck, run off wi' it to keep it a to themselves, and gobble it down in a corner. What may be his name, pr'aps, I should like for to know it?

"You don't quite apprehend me, father. A great deal of what you've said is true to the letter. People don't like to share their good luck, as you say."

"The more credit to them as does," broke in Nathan.

"Ay, but you see even such a fine fellow as my friend Cavendish does not like to give away half his good things for nothing. He expects an equivalent."

"An equivalent," said Nathan: his voice had dropped down an octave. "And what may that be? There's always some meaning in grand words, I take it, though I'm not book-learned enough to find it out."

"Why, in this case the equivalent he demands for taking me into partnership, and afterward relinquishing the whole business to me, is three hundred pounds down."

Benjamin looked sideways from under his eyes to see how his father took the proposition. His father struck his stick deep down in the ground, and leaning one hand upon it, faced round at him.

Then thy fine friend may go and be hanged. Three hundred pound! I'd not give three and a-penny for, if I know where to get 'em, e'en if I'd be making a fool o' thee an' mysen too."

He was out of breath by this time. His son took his father's first words in dogged silence; it was not the burst of temper he had to steel himself to expect, and did not daunt him for long.

"I should think, sir—"

"I should think, sir dost thou 'sir' me? Is them's your manners? I'm plain Nathan Huntsyod, wim ever took on to be a gentleman; but I have paid my way up to this time, which I shunned do much longer if I'm to have a son coming an' asking for three hundred pound just as if I were a cow, and had nothing to do but let down my milk to the first person as comes near me."

"Well, father," said Benjamin, with an affectation of patience, "then there's nothing for me but to do as I have often planned before—go and emigrate."

"And what for" said his father, looking sharply and steadily at him.

"Emigrate. Go to America, or India, or some colony where there would be an opening for a young man like me."

Benjamin had reserved this proposition for his trump card, expecting by means of it to carry all before him. But in his surprise his father plucked his stick out of the hole he had made, when he was vehemently driving it into the ground, and walked on four or five steps in advance; there he stood still again, and there was a dead silence for a few minutes.

"It 'ud, melby, be the best thing down coddle do," the old man said. Benjamin put his tenth hard to keep in cancer. It was well for poor Nathan he did not look round then, and see the look his son gave him. "But it would cause hard like upon us, upon Hester and me, for, whether there's a good or not, it's better on your flesh and blood, our only bairn, and if thou'rt not all as a man could wish it's melby been the fault on your right, I think. It 'ull kill the mistress if he went off to Amerikey, and Bess too, the lass as thinks a deal on him." The arguments originally addressed to his son, had wandered off into a monologue—as keenly listened to by Benjamin, however, as if it had all been spoken to him. After a pause of consideration his father turned round. "I see thou—I mean as old him a friend o' yours, to think of asking you for such a mint o' money—is not th' only one, I'll be bound, as could give ye a start in th' law? Other folks 'ud, melby, do it for less?"

"Well, I've been to give me good advantages," said Benjamin, thinking he perceived signs of relenting.

"Well, then, thou mayst tell him that it's neither he nor thee as 'll see th' sight o' three hunder pound o' my money. All these days as I've a bit laid up again a rainy day; it's not so much as thatten though, and a part on it is for Besey, as has been like a daughter to us."

"But Besey is to be your real daughter some day, when I've been to take her to wife," said Benjamin; for he played very fast and loose, even in his own mind, with his engagement with Besey. Doubtless with her, when she was looking her brightest and best, he behaved to her as if they were engaged lovers: more often he was indeed upon her rather as a good wedge, to be driven into his parent's favor on his behalf. Now, however, he was not exactly insincere in speaking as if he meant to make her his wife: for the thought was in his mind, though he made use of it to work upon his father.

"It 'ull be a dree day for us, then," said the old man. "But th' Lord will have to ha' nothing, and 'll melby be taking more care on us i' heaven by that time than Bess, poor lass as she is, has had on us at Nab-end. Her heart is set on thee, too. Ben, lad, I hanna gotten the three hunder; I hanna, 'cods! th' blessing o' this, nowt, till it reaches fifty pound, and then I takes it to Ripon Bank. Now the last scratch they're given me, made it just two hunder, and I hanna but on to fifteen pound yet: t'the stockin' 'ud I meant on Monday, an' the cow's calf to be for Bess, she's ta'en such pleasure like i' rearing it."

Benjamin gave a sharp glance at his father to see if he was telling the truth; and, that a suspicion of the old man, his father, had entered into the son's head, tells enough of his own character.

"I canna do it—I canna do it, for sure—although I shall like to think as I had helped on the wedding. There's the black heifer to be sold yet, and she'll fetch a matter of ten pound; but a deal on'll be needed for seed-corn, for the arable land by the hall-house is mainly what I would try—'ll tell thee what, lad! I'll make it as though Bess lent thee her hunder, and thou must give her a writ o' hand for it, and thou shalt have a' the money i' Ripon Bank, and nee if the lawyer wannot let thee have a share of what he offered thee for three hunder, for two, I dunnot mean for to wrong him, but thou must get a fair share for the hunder." At times I think that'd done by folk; now, I wadna have to borrow a penny o' Mr. Cavendish' sums time I wadna have thee so soft as to be cheated."

To explain this, it should be told that some of the bills which Benjamin had received money from his father to pay, had been made so to include other and less creditable expenses which the young man had incurred; and the simple old farmer, with a great faith left in him for his boy, was acute enough to perceive that he had given the law much grander sums than articles he had purchased.

After some hesitation, Benjamin agreed to receive this money, and promised to employ it to the best advantage in setting himself up in business. He felt, nevertheless, some misgiving after the additional fifteen pounds that was left to accumulate in the stocking. It was but, he thought, a bit to his father; and he soon lost some of his mental complaisance for Besey in assuming, as he always did, that all their own was money being laid by for her, and grudged it to her even in imagination. He thought more of this fifteen pound than he ought to have, than of all the hardly-earned and humbly-saved two hundred pounds, with its large concessions of. Meanwhile Nathan was in unusual spirits that evening. He was so generous and effectionate as Benjamin. His self-congratulatory satisfaction in having helped two people on the road to happiness was the source of the greater part of his property. The very fact of having trusted his son so largely, seemed to make Benjamin more worthy of all that his liberality entailed. The sole idea he tried to banish was, that, if it came to pass that Benjamin's future faces than Besey would be settled far away from Nab-end: but then he had a child-like reliance that "God would take care of that," and, therefore, why bow or anxodier. It wur o' no use looking too far ahead."

Besey had to hear many unintelligible jokes from her uncle that night; for he made no doubt but Benjamin would be off to Ripon at daybreak, whereas the truth was, his son had said never a word about going there at all.

When the old couple were in bed, Nathan told his wife of the promise he had made to his son, and the sum he had fixed on as advances of the two hundred was to promote. Four Hester was a little startled at the sudden change in the destination of the sum, which she had long thought of with secret pride as "money i' th. bank." But Nathan had been ready to part with it, if necessary, for Benjamin. Only how much more would be required? Why, purple. But even this perplexity was jostled out of her mind by the overwhelming idea, not only of "our Ben" having left them, but of Besey facing there too as his wife. This great trouble swallowed up all care about money, and, getting the fire in an unusual manner for one of her active habits, said:—

"I'm sure wo mun go to th' shop for our bread, an' that's a thing I never thought to come to so long as I lived."

Besey looked up from her kneading surprised.

"I'm sure I'm noan going to eat their nasty stuff. Why! it's worse than Baker's bread, aunt? This dough will rise as high as a kite in a south wind."

"I'm not up to kneading as I could do once; it really breaks my back; and when thou'rt off in a month, Besey, I'll just do as I've done, and time in my life."

"I'm not a going to London," said Besey, kneading away with fresh resolution, and growing very red, either with the idea or the exertion.

"But our Ben is going partner wi' a great London lawyer, and there won't be'll not tarry long but what he'll fetch thee."

Now, aunt," said Besey, stripping her arms of the dough, but still pulling away, "if that's all, don't fret yourself. He knows that very much as he is to leave; only cruties, either to business or in wedlock. I sometimes wonder," she said, with increasing vehemence, "why I go on thinking of him at all, for I don't like to think on me when I'm out o' sight. I've a month's mind to put him into this time when he leaves us—that I have!"

"For shame, wench! and he to be planning and pondering all this while, and saying nowt," yesterday as he was talking to the uncle, and many a long a one to-day; only cruties, either to business or in wedlock. I sometimes wonder," she said, with increasing vehemence, "why I go on thinking of him at all, for I don't like to think on me when I'm out o' sight. I've a month's mind to put him into this time when he leaves us—that I have!"

"For shame, wench! and he to be planning and pondering all this while, and saying nowt his return home with Bessy (for she would not let him go on with his day's work), that his wife made sure he had taken cold, and was angry and indifferent to life, was glad to subside into bed and the rest from exertion which his real bodily illness gave him. Neither Bessy nor he spoke of the letter again, even to each other, for many days; and Bessy feared more to stop Mark Benson's tongue, and satisfy his kindly curiosity by giving him the true side of her own view of the case.

Nathan got up again an older man in looks and constitution by a few years for that one shock. His wife gave him many a scolding on his imprudence for sitting down in the wet field, I ever so tired. But now she, too, was beginning to be uneasy at Benjamin's long-continued silence. She could not write herself, but she urged her husband many a time to send a letter to ask for news of her lad. At last, Nathan went off by himself to the sea-shore, and, having left the horse-and-gig at the inn-door, walked to the post-office. "Thou'lt put that on Sunday but, wilt 'oa, lass? It'll be a bit on a comfort to me; for I know a deal better what's going on when I hear't speak on it for fear o' grieving th' old woman and ye."

"I'll put it on, uncle, if— But he's noan dead."—Bessy was sobbing.

"I know't, lass, I know't. I dunna wish other folk to look my opinion; but I'd like to wear a bit o' crape, and I expect to my turn. But I'll have them see good for to have ordered a black coat, but she'st see if I had na on my weddingnot Sunday but Easter Sunday after Christmas, so far as to ask him for whom he wore it.

But after a while, when they never heard a word from or about Benjamin, they abandoned wonder as to what had become of him grew so painful and strange, that Nathan at last put it by on his tides to himself. Poor Hester, however, rejected it with her whole will, heart, and soul. She could not and would not believe otherwise than should make her believe—that her only child Benjamin had died without some token or word of farewell to her. No arguments could shake her in this. She believed that if all natural means of communication between her and him had been cut off at the last supreme moment—if death had come upon him in an unconscious state, unexpected—her intense love would, she believed, have been supernaturally made conscious of the blank. Nathan at times tried to find out from her she could still hope to see the lad again; but as other members he wound her opinion to be a mere grief, his self-reproach, his weary wonder as to how and when they had done wrong in the treatment of their son, that he had been such a cause and sorrow to his parents. Bessy was convinced, first by her aunt, and then by her brother-in-law, only convinced on both sides of the argument; and so, for the time, able to sympathize with each. But she lost her youth in the next few months; she looked set and middle aged long before she ought to have done, and rarely smiled and never sang again.

All sorts of new arrangements were required by the time which old age necessitates in the energies of all the household at Nab-end. Nathan could no longer go about and direct his two-hoeing

"I'm loth to leave yo' with him alone," said John, "though I'm thinking his leg is broken for sartain, and he can't stir, even if he comes for mischief, to do yo' any harm. But we'll just take off this chap, and make sure of him, and then one on us 'll come back to yo', and we can methy find a gate or so for yo' to get shut on him out o' th' house. This folly's made safe enough, I'll be bound," said he, looking at the bargiar, who stood, bloody black, with fell hatred on his swollen face. His eye caught Betsy's as hers fell on him with dread so evident that it made him smile, and he made one smile more than ever terrible by words from being spoken which were wanted to be spoken from Betsy's lips. She dared not tell, before him, that an slide-bolted accomplice still remained in the house, lest, somehow, the door which kept him a prisoner should be broken open, and he be fight renewed. So she only said to John, as he was leaving the house,

"Then I'm safe for long away, for I'm afeard of being left wi' this man."

"He'll warn do them harm," said John.

"No! but I'm feared lest he should die. And there's uncle and aunt. Come back soon, John!"

"Ay, ay!" said he, half pleased; "I'll be back, never fear me."

So Betsy shut the door after them, but did not look it for fear of mischances in the house, and went over to her uncle, groaning and sighing, by this time, was easier than when she had first returned into the house, after sending off for the doctor. By the light of the fire, too, she could now see that he had received a blow "on the head which could probably be answerable of the stupor. Round this wound, which was now bleeding pretty freely, Betsy set cloths dipped in cold water, and then, leaving him for a time, she lighted a candle, and was about to go up stairs to her aunt, just as the sight of the corpse, the bound and disabled robber, she heard her name softly, urgently called.

"Betsy, Betsy!" At first the voice sounded so close that she thought it must be the unconscious words at her feet. But another and a voice thrilled through her:

"Betsy, Betsy! for God's sake, let me out!"

She went to the stair-closet door, and tried to speak, but could not, her heart beat so terribly. Again, quite close, it said:

"Betsy, Betsy! they'll be back directly; let me out, I say! For God's sake, let me out!"

And he began to kick violently against the panels.

"Hush, hush!" she said, sick with a terrible dread, yet with a will strongly resisting her conviction. "Who are you?" But she knew—knew quite well.

"Benjamin. An end! "Let me out, I say, and I'll be off, and out of England by tomorrow night, never to come back, and you'll have all our fortunes, mine."

"D'ye think I care for that," said Betsy, vehemently, feeling with trembling hands for the lock; "I wish there was none of it—a thing no money i' the world, afore yo'd come to this. There, you're free, and I charge yo' never let me see your face again. I'd ne'e ha' let yo' loose but for fear o' breaking their hearts, if yo' human kindness' friendly." But, when the door had ended her speech, he was gone—off into the black darkness, into the fog, the open world. With a new terror in her mind Betsy shut it afresh—shut it and bolted it this time. Then she sat down on the first chair, and leaned her head out by giving a great and exceeding bitter cry. But she knew it was no time for that, however, and, lifting herself up with as much effort as if each of her limbs was a heavy weight, she went into the back kitchen, and took a drink of cold water. To her surprise, she heard her uncle's voice saying feebly,

"Carry me up, and lay me by her."

But Betsy could not carry him; she could only help his faint exertions to walk up stairs; and, by the time he was there, sitting panting on the first chair she could find, John Kirby and Jem Jetson returned. John came up now to her aid. Her aunt lay across the bed in a fainting fit, and her mouth was so utterly locked that it was a state that Betsy feared immediate death for both. But John cleared her with a few drops of water into his bed again, and, while Betsy tried to compose poor Hester's limbs into a position of rest, John went down to hunt about for the best store of gin which was always kept in a corner cupboard against emergencies.

"They've had a sore fright," said he, shaking his head, as he poured a little gin and hot water into their mother's with a teaspoon, "and I'm shathed their cold feet; "and it and the cold have been welly too much for him, poor chap! folk!"

He looked tenderly at them, and Betsy blessed him in her heart—blessed him unaware, for that look.

"I mun be off. I sent Atkinson up to th' farm for to bring down Bob, and Jack came wi' him back to th' shippon for to look after other man. He began blockguarding as th' constables and Bob and Jack were gagging him wi' bridles when I left."

"Ne'er give heed to what he says," cried poor Betsy, now pale beseeching her. "Folks o' his sort are alleys for dragging other folks into their mischief. I'm right glad he were well gagged."

"Well! but what I were saying were this. Atkinson and me will take t'other chap, who seems quiet enough, to th' shippon, and it 'll be one piece o' work for to mind them and the cow; and I'll saddle old bay mare, and ride for constables and doctor fra Highmainster. I'll bring Dr. Preston up to see Nathan and Hester first, and then I reckon the broken-legged chap down below must have his turn, for all as he's but wi' his misfortunes in a wrong line o' life."

"Ay!" said Betsy. "We mun ha' the doctor sure enough, for look at them how they lie! like two stone statues on a church monument, so sad and solemn."

"There's a look o' sense come back into their faces, though, sin' they supped that gin-and-hot. I'd keep on a bathing his head and giving them a sup on's fra time to time, if I was you, Betsy."

Betsy followed him down stairs, and lighted the men out of the house. She dared not light them carrying their burden even until they passed round the corner of the house, so strong was her fearful suspicion that Benjamin was lurking near, seeking again to enter. She rushed back into the kitchen, bolted and barred the door, and pushed the end of the dresser against it, shutting her eyes as she passed the unscreened window for fear of catching a glimpse of a white face pressed against the glass, and guessed at her. Then she sat down, and began to speechless, although Hester's position had slightly altered: she had turned a little on her side, and her left hand, which had been under shriveled arm around his neck. But he was just as Betsy had left him, save the new cloths round his head, his eyes not wanting in a certain intelligence, but solemn, and unconscious to all that was passing around as the eyes of death.

His wife spoke a little from time to time—said a word of thanks, perhaps, or lay in fear of more. All the rest of that terrible night Betsy tended the poor old couple with constant care, her own heart so stunned with grief that it felt feeling that she went about her pious duties almost like one in a dream. But another sensation was gradually coming; nor did she perceive any change either for the worse or the better before the doctor came, shortly after daylight. Then Betsy thought him, and was full of the capture of the bargiar.

As far as Betsy could make out, the capture, in spite of that unnatural Third was unknown; it was a relief, almost a pleasure, to the doctor to leave her from her terrible fear, which now she felt she had banned and harbored a monster in the house, and had, in fact, paralyzed her from thinking. Now she felt—and thought with acute and intensely vivid sensation—that she was safe, and the sleepless night she had passed. She felt almost sure that the bargiar (Benjamin was too) had recognized Benjamin; but there was a faint chance that they had not done so, and that Betsy remained safe from his vengeance, her, nor should any insolvent word betray the fact that there had been a third person present at all. As to Nathan, he had never uttered a word. It was her aunt's silence that made Betsy fear that Hester knew, and was afraid to speak on concerned.

The doctor examined them both closely; looked hard at the wound on Nathan's head; asked questions which Hester answered shortly and unwillingly, and then left them. Betsy watched his eyes as it even the sight of a stranger was pain to him. Betsy could not tell whether or not that she could answer respecting their state, and followed the doctor down stairs with a beating heart. When he was about to leave the house, they found that John had opened the outer door to let in some of the fresh air, and the bargiar, and made up the fire, and put the chairs and table in their right places. He reddened a little at Betsy's eye as she stood in the doorway to pass him, but tried to smile it off in a dry kind of way.

"Yo' see I'm an old bachelor, and I just thought as I'd redd up things a bit. How dun you find you, doctor?"

"Well, the poor old couple have had a terrible shock. I shall send them some composing medicine to bring down the pulse, and a lotion for the man's head. It is very well it bled so much; there might have been a fever from the effusion of blood." And so he went on, giving directions to Betsy, and keeping them quietly in bed through the day. Then Dr. Preston came again to say that they were not, as she had feared all night long, near to death. The doctor expected them to recover, though they would require care. She almost wished it had been otherwise, and that they, and she too, might die, and be laid out in their rest in the church-yard—so cruel did life seem to her; so desolate the desolation of that subdued voice of the hidden robber, smiting her with recognition.

All this time John was getting things ready for breakfast with something of the handiness of a woman. Betsy felt grateful and efficiency in pressing Dr. Preston to have a cup of tea, she did so want him to be gone and leave her alone with her thoughts. She did not know that all was done for love of her; that the hardhearted, almost cruel man was thinking at the time how ill and miserable she looked, and trying with tender artifices to make it incumbent upon the sense of hospitality in him to feed Betsy into a meal.

"I'll soon as the cows is milked," said he, "yourn and all; and Atkinson's brought ours round fine. Whatten a mercy it were as she were sick just when I got to th' house, and as he made short work on't! yo' hadna fetched us in, and as it were he had a sore time on't, for on 'em 'll bear the marks on't to his dying day, wunnot he, doctor?"

"He'll barely have his leg well enough to stand his trial at York assizes; they're coming on in a fortnight from now."

"Ay, and that reminds me, Bessy, you'll have to go witness before Justice Roydes. Constables bade me tell yo', and give yo' this summons. Dunnot be feared; it will not be a long job, though I'm not saying as it 'll be a pleasant one. You'll have to answer questions as to how, and all about it; and Jane" (his sister) "will come and stop wi' th' cud folks; and I'll drive yo' in the shandry."

No one knew why Betsy's color blenched and her eyes fell. Jem knew how she apprehended her she should have to say that Benjamin had been of the gang, if, indeed, in some way the law had not followed on his heels quick enough to catch him.

But that trial was spared her; she was warned by John to answer questions, and say no more than was necessary, for fear of making her story less clear; and as she was known, by character, at least, to Justice Royds and his clerk, they made the examination as little formidable as possible.

When all was over, and John was driving her back again, he expressed his rejoicing that there would be evidence enough to convict the men without summoning Nathan and Hester to identify them. Betsy was so tired that she hardly understood such an escape from fear, far greater than even her companion understood.

Jane Kirby staid with her for a week or more, and was a most comfortable comfort. Otherwise she sometimes thought she should have gone mad, with the fear of her uncle always preventing her, in its stony expression of agony, of that fearful night. Her aunt was softer in her sorrow; she became not the mere clothes and house maker; but it was easy to see how her heart bled inwardly. Her constitutional strength sooner than her husband; but as she recovered, the doctor perceived the rapid approach of total blindness. Every day, every hour of the day, that Betsy dared, without fear of exciting their suspicion, she took them out into the fields, that they might had anxiously told them at first, that only two men, and those perfect strangers, had been disturbed on the night recorded in the bargiar's. Her uncle would never have asked a question about it, even if she had withheld all information about the affair; but she noticed the quick, watching, waiting glance of His eye whenever she returned from any journey, and knew she might have been supposed to gain intelligence if Benjamin were suspected or caught, and she hastened to relieve the old man's anxiety by always telling all that she had heard, thankful that as the days passed on her power she sickened to speak or to grow less and less.

At last Betsy had ground for thinking that her aunt knew more than she had apprehended at first. There was something so very humble and contrite in Hester's blind way of feeling about for her husband—stern, woe-begone Nathan—and hastily striving to console him, that Betsy was sure of which Benjamin had been the loving, piteous manner, that her aunt was consoling. And one day, when Betsy, sitting near his, tears slowly running down from her sightless eyes, while from time to time, when she thought herself unobserved, she wiped them on the bed-post such texts as she had heard at church in younger days, and which she thought, in her true, simple piety, might tend to console him. Yet day by day her aunt grew more and more old.

Three or four days before assizes, two summonses to attend the trial at York were sent on to the old people. Neither Betsy, nor Aunt Jane, could understand this; for their own notices had come long before, and they had been told that their evidence was not necessary to convict.

But also that the fact was the lawyer employed to defend the prisoners had heard from them that there was a third person engaged, and had heard who that third person was; and it was his advocate's business to diminish, if possible, the guilt of his clients, by showing that they were entirely in the hands of one who had, from his superior knowledge of the premises and the daily customs of the inhabitants, been the originator and planner of the whole affair. To do this, it was necessary that he should call the parties, who, as the prisoners had said, must have recognized the voice of the young man, their son. For no one knew that any of the family had been witness to his having been present, and, as it was supposed that Benjamin had escaped out of the house, there was no exact betrayal of him on the part of his accomplices.

Wondering, perplexed, and weary, the old couple reached York, in company with John and Betsy, on the eve of the day of trial. Nathan was still so much confused that Betsy could never guess what had been passing in his mind. He was almost passive, except when his trembling caresses; he seemed hardly conscious of them, so rigid was his demeanor.

She, like Jane at times, was becoming childish; for she had evidently so great and anxious love for her husband, that she never seemed going in her endeavors to melt the stoniness of his aspect and manners; she appeared accustomed to it. She did not know why he was so changed, in her piteous little attempts to bring him back to the world of love.

"They'll for sure never torture them when they see what old folks they are?" cried Betsy, for the moment at the trial, a dim fear looming over her mind. "They'll never be so cruel, no, John?"

But "for sure" it was so. The barrister looked up at the judge, almost apologetically, as he rose how honorableand and woeful an old man was put into the witness-box when the defense broke in, and Nathan Huntroyd was called on for his evidence.

"It is necessary, on behalf of my clients, my lord, that I should receive a counsel which, for all other reasons, I deplore."

"Go on!" said the judge. "What is right and legal must be done." But, an old man himself, he covered his quivering mouth with his hand as Nathan, with gray, unmoved face, and solemn, hollow eyes, placing his two hands on each side of the witness-box, prepared to give his answers to questions, the nature of which he was beginning to foresee, but would not shrink from replying to truthfully; "the very atoms" (as he said to himself, with a kind of dulled sense of the Eternal Justice) "rise up against such a prisoner."

"Your name is Nathan Huntroyd, I believe?"

"It is."

"You live at Nab-end Farm?"

"I do."

"Did you remember the night of November the twelfth?"

"Yes."

"You were awakened that night by some noise, I believe. What was it?"

"I and those with me were awakened by a loud noise, which I took of a creature brought to bay. That the prisoner at the barrister never forgets. I will haunt him till his dying day.

"It was a throwing up of stones against our window."

"Did you hear it at first?"

"Yes."

"What awakened you, then?"

"She did."

"And then you both heard the stones. Did you hear nothing else?"

"Nothing. Then a low, clear "Yes."

"What?"

"Our Benjamin asking us for to let him in. She said as he were here, beseeching us."

"And you thought it was him, did you not?"

"I took her" (this time in a louder voice) "for to get to sleep, and not to be thinking that every drunken chap as passed by were our Benjamin, for that he were dead and gone."

"And she?"

"She said as though she'd heard our Benjamin afore she were welly awake, axing for to be let in. But I bode her no'er heed her dreams, but put her to sleep again, and got to sleep again."

"And did she?"

A long pause—judge, jury, bar, audience, all held their breath. At length Nathan said,

"No."

"What did you do then? (My lord, I am compelled to ask these painful questions.)"

"I too went to sleep, for quite a while had allby thought he would come back to us, like the Prodigal i' th' Gospels. (His voice choked a little, but he managed to make it steady, and went on.) "She said if I wadna get up she would; and I did not, then I dare say I did. I'm not quite myself, gentlemen—I've been ill and I fear an it makes me trembling-like. Some one said, further, whether I'm here, starving i' the cold, —wunnot yo' get up and let me in?"

"And what did you answer?"

"It were like our Benjamin's. I see whatten yo're driving at, sir, and I'll tell yo' truth, though it kills me to do it. I thought I owned a voice our Benjamin as spoke, mind yo'—I only say it were like—"

"That's all I want, my good fellow. And on the strength of that entreaty, spoken in your own voice, you, who want days and days of rest to these two prisoners at the bar, and to a third man?"

Nathan nodded assent, and even that counsel was too merciful to force him to put more into words.

"Call Hester Huntroyd."

An old woman, with a face of which the eyes were crushed out, with a wan, bleeding, sightless worn face, came into the witness-box, and meekly questioned as to the presence of those who had been taught to respect—a presence she could not see.

There was something in her humble, blind aspect, as she stood waiting to have something done to her—what, she knew not, because they would not know—that touched all who saw her inexpressibly. Again the counsel apologized, but the judge could not spare her. Her face was quivering all over, and the jury looked uneasily at the prisoners' counsel. That gentleman saw that he might go too far, and soon felt sympathies off on the other side; but one or two questions he must ask, as hardly overstepping much that he had learned from Nathan, he said, "You believed it was your son's voice asking to be let in?"

"Ay! our Benjamin came home, I'm sure; please when he is gone."

She turned her head about, as if listening for the voice of her child in the hushed silence of the court.

"Yes; he came home that night—and your husband went down to let him in?"

"Well! I believe he did. There was a great noise of folk down stair."

"And you heard your son Benjamin's voice among the others?"

"Is it a sin to him harm, sir?" asked she, her face growing more intelligent and intent on the business in hand;

"And you—did you tell them?"

"Nay, sir, I'm sure Nathan wouldn't like me to."

"What did you do then?"

A shade of reluctance came over her face, as if she began to perceive causes and consequences.

"I just screamed on Bessy—that's my niece, sir."

"And you heard some one shout out from the bottom of the stairs?"

Hester looked pleased at him, but did not answer.

"Gentlemen of the jury, I wish to call your particular attention to this fact: she acknowledges she heard some one shout—some third person, you observe—shout out to the two above. What did he say? That is the last question I shall trouble you with. What did the third person, left behind down stairs, say?"

Her face worked—her mouth opened two or three times as if to speak—she stretched out her arms imploringly; but no word came, and she fell back into the arms of those nearest to her. Nathan forced himself forward into the witness-box:

"My Lord Judge, a woman bore ye, as I reckon; it's a cruel shame to serve a mother so. It was my son, my only child, as called out for us t' open door, and who shouted out for to hold th' old woman's throat if she did n't stop her noise, when hoo'd fain ha' cried for her nieces to help. And now ye've truth, and a'th' truth, and I'll leave yo' to th' Judgment o' God for the way yo've gotten at it."

Before night the mother was stricken with paralysis, and lay on her death-bed. But the broken-hearted go Home, to be comforted of God.

THE GHOST IN THE CORNER ROOM.

BY CHARLES DICKENS.

I HAD observed Mr. Governor growing fidgety as his turn—his "spell," he called it—approached, and he now surprised us all by rising with a serious countenance, and requesting permission to "come off" and have speech with his brother he span his yarn. His great popularity led to a gracious concession of this indulgence, and we went out together into the hall.

"Old shipmate," said Mr. Governor to me, "every word I have been about of this old hulk, I have been haunted, day and night."

"By what, Jack?"

Mr. Governor, clapping his hand on my shoulder and keeping it there, said,

"By something in the likeness of a Woman."

"Ah! Your old affliction. You'll never get over that, Jack, if you live to be a hundred."

"No, don't talk so, because I am very nervous. All night long, I have been haunted by one figure. At last the same figure has now followed me in the kitchen, that I wonder I haven't poisoned the whole ship's company. Now there's no fancy here. Would you like to see the figure?"

"I should like to see it very much."

"Then here it is!" said Jack. Thereupon he presented my sister, who had stolen out quietly after us.

"Oh, indeed?" said I. "Then, I suppose, Patsy, my love, I have no occasion to ask whether you have been haunted?"

"Constantly, Joe," she replied.

The effect of our going back again, all three together, and of my presenting my sister as the Ghost from the Corner Room, and of her as the Ghost from my Sister's Room, was triumphant—the crowning hit of the night. Mr. Beaver was so particularly delighted, that he bravely declared "a very little would make him dance a hornpipe." Mr. Governor immediately supplied the very little, by offering to make it a double hornpipe; and there ensued such toe-and-heeling, and buckle-covering, and double-shuffling, and heel-sliding, and execution of all sorts of slippery manœuvres with sixteen legs as none of us ever saw before or will ever see again. When we had all laughed and applauded till we were faint, Starling, not to be outdone, favored us with a more modern salutary entertainment in the Lancashire clog manner—to the best of my belief, the longest dance ever performed: in which the sound of his feet became a locomotive going through cuttings, tunnels, and embankment, and became a vast number of other things we should never have suspected, unless he had kindly told us what they were.

It was resolved, before we separated that night, that our three months' guests in the Marshal House should be wound up with the marriage of my sister and Mr. Governor. Failing the nominated bridesmaid, and Starling was engaged for bridegroom's man.

In a word, we lived our term out, most happily, and were never for a moment haunted by any thing more disagreeable than our own imaginations and remembrances. My cousin's wife, on her great love for her husband, and in her gratitude to him for the change he had wrought in her, had told us, through his lips, her own story; and I am sure there was not one of us who did not like her the better for it, and pity her for the more.

So, at last, before the shortest month in the year was quite out, we all walked forth one morning to the church with the spire as if nothing uncommon were going to happen; and there Jack and my sister were married, as sensibly as could be. It comes into me now that that day I served Belinda and Alfred Starling to be rather sentimental and low on the occasion, and that they are since engaged to be married in the same church. I regard it as an excellent thing for both, and a kind of union very wholesome for the times in which we live. He wants a little poetry, and she wants a little prose, and the marriage of the two things is the happiest marriage I know for all mankind.

Finally, I unveil this Christmas Greeting from the Haunted House, which I affectionately address with all my heart to all my readers: Let us use the great virtue, Faith, but not the abuse it; and let us put it to its best use, by having faith in the great Christmas book of the New Testament, and in one another.

HARPER & BROTHERS,

FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK,

Have lately Published:

THE DIARY OF A SAMARITAN. By a Member of the Howard Association of New Orleans. 12mo, Muslin, $1 00.

PICTORIAL BIBLE. Harper's Illuminated and New Pictorial Bible. Embellished with Sixteen Hundred Historical Engravings, exclusive of an Initial Letter to each Chapter, by J. A. ADAMS, more than Fourteen Hundred of which are from Original Designs, by J. G. CHAPMAN.

Morocco, gilt edges, beveled and paneled sides . $25 00
Morocco extra, gilt edges 22 50
Full Calf embossed, gilt edges 20 00
Full Calf, marbled edges, blank stamped . . . 18 00
Full Roan, marbled edges 16 00

Cloud and forwarded by Express, on receipt of the Money.

HOWITT'S HISTORY OF AMERICA. A Popular History of the United States of America: from the Discovery of the American Continent to the Present Time. By MARY HOWITT. Illustrated by numerous Engravings. 2 vols. 12mo, Muslin, $3 00.

HANDIE. Being the first volume of STORIES OF RAINBOW AND LUCKY. By JACOB ABBOTT. Beautifully Illustrated. 16mo, Muslin, 50 cents. (Uniform with ABBOTT'S FRANCONIA Stories.)

PREACHERS AND PREACHING. By EDWARD, Author of "Letters to Bishop Hughes," "Romanism at Home," "Man and Things in Europe," &c., &c. 12mo, Muslin, 75 cents.

HARRY LEE; or, Hope for the Poor. With Illustrations. 12mo, Muslin, 75 cents.

THE PRAIRIE TRAVELLER. A Hand-Book for Overland Emigrants. With Maps, Illustrations, and Itineraries of the Principal Routes between the Mississippi and the Pacific. By RANDOLPH B. MARCY, Captain U. S. Army. Published by Authority of the War Department. Small 12mo, Muslin, $1 00.

FISHER'S RIVER (North Carolina), Scenes and Characters. By "SETTE." "Who was Raised Thar." Illustrated by JOHN MCLENAN. 12mo, Muslin, $1 00.

WOMEN ARTISTS IN ALL AGES AND COUNTRIES. By MRS. ELLET, Author of "Women of the American Revolution," &c. 12mo, Muslin, $1 00.

THE QUEEN OF HEARTS. 'A Novel. By WILKIE COLLINS, Author of "Antonina; or, The Fall of Rome." 12mo, Muslin, $1 00.

MY THIRD BOOK. A Collection of Tales. By LOUISE CHANDLER MOULTON. 12mo, Muslin, $1 00.

THE WARS OF THE ROSES; or, Stories of the Struggle of York and Lancaster. By J. G. EDGAR, Author of "The Boyhood of Great Men," "The Forgeries of Famous Men," "History for Boys," &c. Illustrations. 16mo, Muslin, 60 cents.

THE VIRGINIANS. A Tale of the Last Century. By W. M. THACKERAY, Author of "The Newcomes," "Vanity Fair," "Pendennis," "Henry Esmond," "The Great Hoggarty Diamond," "Lectures on English Humorists," &c., &c. With Illustrations by the Author. 8vo, Paper, $1 75; Muslin, $2 00.

LIFE AND LIBERTY IN AMERICA; or, Sketches of a Tour in the United States and Canada in 1857-8. By CHARLES MACKAY, LL.D., F.S.A. With Ten Illustrations. 12mo, Muslin, $1 00.

A GOOD FIGHT, and Other Tales. By CHARLES READE, Author of "Love me Little, Love me Long," &c. Embracing: I.—"A Good Fight." II.—"Jack of all Trades." III. "Autobiography of a Thief." Illustrations. 12mo, Muslin, 75 cents.

SWORD AND GOWN. A Novel. By the Author of "Guy Livingstone." 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

A LIFE FOR A LIFE. By the Author of "John Halifax," "The Ogilvies," "The Head of the Family," &c., &c. Cheap Edition, 8vo, Paper, 50 cents. The Library Edition conforms with the Library Edition of "John Halifax"), 12mo, Muslin, $1 00.

HENRY ST. JOHN, GENTLEMAN, of Flower of Hundreds, in the County of Prince George, Virginia. A Tale of 1774, 1775. By JOHN ESTEN COOKE, Author of "Leather Stocking and Silk," "The Virginia Comedians," &c., &c. 12mo, Muslin, $1 00.

MISS STRICKLAND'S QUEENS OF SCOTLAND. Lives of the Queens of Scotland and English Princesses connected with the Royal Succession of Great Britain. By AGNES STRICKLAND. Vol. VIII. completing the Work. 12mo, Muslin, $1 00. Complete Sets in Muslin, $9 00; Half Calf, $14 50.

THE LIFE OF JABEZ BUNTING, D.D., with Notices of Contemporary Persons and Events. By his Son, THOMAS PERCIVAL BUNTING. Vol. I., with a Portrait. 12mo, Muslin, $1 00.

ABBOTT'S FRENCH REVOLUTION. The French Revolution of 1789, as viewed in the light of Republican Institutions. By JOHN S. C. ABBOTT, Author of "The History of Napoleon Bonaparte," "Napoleon at St. Helena," &c. With numerous Engravings. 8vo, Muslin, $2 00.

GERALD FITZGERALD, "THE CHEVALIER." A Novel. By CHARLES LEVER, Author of "Charles O'Malley," "Glencore," "The Dodd Family Abroad," "Sir Jasper Carew," "Maurice Tiernay," &c. Complete. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

AMERICAN WIT AND HUMOR. Illustrated by J. MCLENAN. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

WALTER THORNLEY; or, A Peep at the Past. By the Author of "Adam Graeme" and "Alida" (Mrs. SEDGWICK). 12mo, Muslin, $1 00.

JOHN HALIFAX, GENTLEMAN. By the Author of "Olive," "The Ogilvies," "Agatha's Husband," "Avillion," "The Head of the Family," "A Hero," &c., &c.—Library Edition, with Four Illustrations by AUGUSTUS HOPPIN, Esq. 12mo, Muslin, $1 00.

LOVE ME LITTLE, LOVE ME LONG. A Novel. By CHARLES READE, Author of "A Good Fight," "Christie Johnstone," "Peg Woffington," &c. 12mo, Muslin, 75 cents; Paper, 50 cents.

WHAT WILL HE DO WITH IT? By PISISTRATUS CAXTON. A Novel. By Sir E. BULWER LYTTON, Bart., Author of "My Novel; or, Varieties in English Life," "The Caxtons," "Pelham," "Night and Morning," &c., &c. 8vo, Muslin, 75 cents; Paper, 50 cents.

THE ROMANCE AND ITS HERO. By the Author of "Magdalen Stafford." 12mo, Muslin, $1 00.

THE LAIRD OF NORLAW. A Scottish Story. By the Author of "Margaret Maitland," "The Days of My Life," &c. 12mo, Muslin, $1 00.

THE OLD PLANTATION, and What I Gathered There in an Autumn Month. By JAMES HUNGERFORD, of Maryland. 12mo, Muslin, $1 00.

MY LADY LUDLOW. A Novel. By MRS. GASKELL, Author of "Mary Barton," "North and South," "Cranford," "The Moorland Cottage," &c. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

THE DIVIDING LINE BETWEEN FEDERAL AND LOCAL AUTHORITY. By STEPHEN A. DOUGLAS. 8vo, Paper, five cents.

TRUMPS. A Novel. By GEORGE WILLIAM CURTIS. In course of publication in HARPER'S WEEKLY. Illustrated by HOPPIN. Five Cents a Number.

THE STUDENT'S HOME. A History of England, from the Earliest Times to the Revolution in 1688. By DAVID HUME. Abridged. Incorporating the Researches of recent Historians, and continued down to the Year 1858. Illustrated by numerous Engravings on Wood. Uniform with Smith's "History of Greece," Liddell's "History of Rome," and "The Student's Gibbon." Large 12mo, Muslin, $1 00.

THE STUDENT'S HISTORY OF GREECE. A History of Greece, from the Earliest Times to the Roman Conquest, with Supplementary Chapters on the History of Literature and Art. By WILLIAM SMITH, LL.D., Editor of the "Classical Dictionary" and the "Dictionary of Greek and Roman Antiquities." For Schools and Students. Revised, with an Appendix, by GEORGE W. GREENE, A.M. Illustrated with 100 Wood-cuts. Large 12mo, Muslin, $1 00.

THE STUDENT'S HISTORY OF ROME. A School History of Rome, from the Earliest Times to the Establishment of the Empire. With Chapters on the History of Literature and Art. By HENRY G. LIDDELL, D.D., Dean of Christ Church, Oxford. Illustrated by Numerous Wood-cuts. Large 12mo, Muslin, $1 00.

THE STUDENT'S GIBBON. The History of the Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire. By EDWARD GIBBON. Abridged. Incorporating the Researches of Recent Commentators. By WILLIAM SMITH, LL.D. Illustrated by 100 Engravings on Wood. Large 12mo, Muslin, $1 00.

A DICTIONARY OF PRACTICAL MEDICINE; comprising General Pathology, the Nature and Treatment of Diseases, Morbid Structures, and the Disorders especially incidental to Climates, to the Sea, and to the different Epochs of Life; with numerous Prescriptions for the Medicines recommended. A Classification of Diseases; a copious Bibliography; an Appendix of approved Formulæ, &c., &c. By JAMES COPLAND, M.D., F.R.S. Edited by CHARLES A. LEE, A.M., M.D. Complete in 3 large 8vo Volumes. Muslin, $5 00 per Volume; Sheep extra, $5 50 per Volume.

FOWLER'S ELEMENTARY GRAMMAR. Elementary Grammar, Etymology and Syntax. Abridged from the Octavo Edition of "The English Language in its Elements and Forms." Designed for General Use in Common Schools. By WILLIAM C. FOWLER, late Professor of Rhetoric in Amherst College. 12mo, Muslin, 50 cents.

ANTHON'S CICERO DE OFFICIIS. M. T. Ciceronis de Officiis Libri Tres. With Marginal Analysis and an English Commentary. Edited for the Syndics of the University Press. By the Rev. CHARLES ANTHON, LL.D., Professor of Greek in Columbia College. 12mo, Sheep extra, 75 cents.

HUMBOLDT'S COSMOS. Cosmos. A Sketch of a Physical Description of the Universe. By ALEXANDER VON HUMBOLDT. Translated from the German by E. C. OTTE and W. S. DALLAS, F.L.S. Vol. V. 12mo, Muslin, 65 cents. Complete in 5 vols., $4 25.

ALFORD'S GREEK TESTAMENT. The Greek Testament: with a Critically Revised Text; a Digest of Various Readings; Marginal References to Verbal and Idiomatic Usage; Prolegomena; and a Critical and Exegetical Commentary. For the Use of Theological Students and Ministers. By HENRY ALFORD, B.D., Minister of Quebec Chapel, London, and late Fellow of Trinity College, Cambridge. Vol. I., containing the Four Gospels. 8vo, Muslin, $5 00; Sheep extra, $5 50; Half Calf extra, $6 00.

☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send either of the above Works by Mail, postage paid (or any thing else in the United States under 3000 miles), on receipt of the Money.

Miss Edgeworth's Novels.
With Engravings.

10 vols. 12mo, Muslin, 75 cents per Volume.

The Volumes are sold separately or in Sets. Sets in Half Calf, $10 00.

Vol. I. Castle Rackrent; Essay on Irish Bulls: Essay on Self-Justification; The Prussian Vase; The Good Aunt.

Vol. II. Angelina; The Good French Governess: Mademoiselle Panache: The Knapsack: Lame Jervis: The Will: Out of Debt, Out of Danger: The Limerick Glover: The Lottery: Rosanna.

Vol. III. Manufacturers, Arkwright and the Manufacturers; Ennui; The Contrast: The Grateful Negro; To-morrow: The Dun.

Vol. IV. Manœuvering: Almeria: Virtue.

Vol. V. The Absentee; Madame de Fleury: Emily de Coulanges: The Modern Griselda.

Vol. VI. Harry and Lucy.

Vol. VII. Leonora: Letters on Female Education; Patronage.

Vol. VIII. Patronage: Comic Dramas.

Vol. IX. Harrington; Thoughts on Bores; Ormond.

Vol. X. Helen.

It is unnecessary at this late day to eulogize the works of Miss Edgeworth—they have taken an enduring position in English literature. Her Walter Scott, with his characteristic frankness, has acknowledged that his original idea when he commenced his career as a novelist, was to be a second Miss Edgeworth; and that to Ireland—to portray the peculiarity of manners belonging rather to the generation passing away than to that which is now existing, and to give life to the natural scenery, and permanence to the national characteristics of his countrymen. In depicting the strange varieties of Irish character, whether grave or gay, Miss Edgeworth is confessedly without an equal. Her comic and playful satire marks her high in the dominions of humor, while it is combined with a sterling common sense, and a power of picturesque description which seldom fails to the lot of the wit or the satirist. Her story-telling powers are admirable.

The whole of the works, as published in this edition, have undergone a careful revision and correction by the author herself.

Published by HARPER & BROTHERS,
Franklin Square, New York.

☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send the above by mail, postage pre-paid (for any distance in the United States under 3000 miles), on receipt of the Money.

Standard Library Works

SUITABLE FOR GIFT-BOOKS,

PUBLISHED BY HARPER & BROTHERS, Franklin Square, N. Y.

☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send either of the following Works by Mail, postage paid (for any distance in the United States under 3000 miles), on receipt of the Money.

☞ HARPER & BROTHERS' NEW DESCRIPTIVE CATALOGUE of their PUBLICATIONS may be obtained gratuitously, on application at the Publishers' personally, or by letter inclosing SIX CENTS in postage stamps.

Abbott's History of the French Revolution. The French Revolution of 1789, as viewed in the Light of Republican Institutions. By JOHN S. C. ABBOTT. With 240 Engravings. 2 vols. 12mo, Muslin, $3 00; Half Calf, $5 00.

Abbott's History of Napoleon Bonaparte. With Maps, Wood-cuts, and Portraits on Steel. 2 vols. 8vo, Muslin, $5 00; Sheep, $6 00; Half Calf, $7 00; Turkey Morocco, $10 00.

Abbott's Napoleon at St. Helena. Interesting Anecdotes and Remarkable Conversations of the Emperor during Six Years and a Half Years of his Captivity. From the Memorials of Las Cases, O'Meara, Montholon, &c. By JOHN S. C. ABBOTT. 1 vol. 12mo, Muslin, $1 50; Sheep, $1 875; Half Calf, $3 00.

Addison's Complete Works, including the Contributions of the Spectator. Complete in 3 vols. 8vo, Sheep extra, $6 00; Half Calf, $9 00.

Alford's Greek Testament. The Greek Testament, with a Critically Revised Text; a Digest of Various Readings; Marginal References to Verbal and Idiomatic Usage; Prolegomena; and a Critical and Exegetical Commentary. By the late HENRY ALFORD, Dean of Canterbury. By HENRY ALFORD. Revised Edition. Quebec Chapel, London, and late Fellow of Trinity College, Cambridge. Vol. I., containing the Four Gospels. 944 pages, 8vo, Muslin, $6 00; Sheep extra, $7 50; Half Calf, $9 00.

Alison's History of Europe.

FIRST SERIES.—From the Commencement of the French Revolution in 1789, to the Restoration of the Bourbons in 1815. 20 vols. 12mo, Muslin, $20 00; Half Calf, $40 00. Which convert the Livres of the Original Work into Dollars and United States Currency. A Useful Index has been appended to this American Edition. 4 vols. 8vo, Muslin, $6 00; Sheep extra, $8 00; Half Calf, $12 00.

SECOND SERIES.—From the Fall of Napoleon in 1815, to the Accession of Louis Napoleon, in 1852. 8 vols. 8vo, Muslin, $12 00; Sheep extra, $16 00; Half Calf, $24 00. The 4th and concluding volume, with copious Analytical Index, will be ready in a few days.

Alison's Military Life of John, Duke of Marlborough. With Maps and Plans. 2 vols. 8vo, Half Calf, $3 50.

Atkinson on Oriental and Western Siberia. A Narrative of Seven Years' Explorations and Adventures in Siberia, Mongolia, the Kirghis Steppes, Chinese Tartary, and Part of Central Asia. By JOHN ATKINSON. Illustrated by Engravings on Wood, and Maps. 1 vol. 8vo, Muslin, $5 00; Half Calf, $4 00.

Barth's Travels and Discoveries in North and Central Africa. Embodying the Results of Illustrated. This only complete American Edition. 3 vols. 8vo, Muslin, $6 00; Half Calf, $9 00.

Bancroft's Literary and Historical Miscellanies. 8vo, Muslin, $2 50; Half Calf, $4 00.

Barnes's Notes on the New Testament. For Bible Classes and Sunday-Schools. Maps and Engravings. 11 vols. 12mo, Muslin, $11 00; Half Calf, $17 00 per Set. The Volumes are separately.

Blackstone's Commentaries on the Laws of England. With Notes Explaining the Text, Work to the American Student. By JOHN L. WARREN, late Chief Justice of New York. 4 vols. 8vo, Law Sheep, $7 00.

Boswell's Life of Dr. Johnson. Portrait of Boswell. 2 vols. 8vo, Sheep extra, $3 00; Half Calf, $4 00.

Brodhead's History of the State of New York. First Period, 1609-1664. 8vo, Muslin, $3 00; Half Calf, $4 00.

Bunting's (Rev. Dr. Jabez) Life. With Notices of Contemporary Persons and Events. By his Son, THOMAS PERCIVAL BUNTING. Vol. 4., with Portrait. 12mo, Muslin, $1 00.

Burke's Complete Works. With a Memoir. Portrait. 8 vols. 8vo, Sheep extra, $6 00; Half Calf, $9 00.

Burton's Life and Works. Edited by ROSSITER THAXTER. 4 vols. 12mo, Muslin, $3 00; Half Calf, $6 00.

Burr's Memoirs, with Miscellaneous Correspondence, Notes by M. L. DAVIS. Portrait. 2 vols. 8vo, Muslin, $3 00; Half Calf, $5 00.

Burr's Private Journal, during his Residence in Europe; with Selections from his Correspondence. By M. L. DAVIS. 2 vols. 8vo, Muslin, $3 00; Half Calf, $5 00.

Burke's Complete Works. With a Memoir. Portrait. 8 vols. 8vo, Sheep extra, $6 00; Half Calf, $9 00.

Burton's Life and Works. Edited by ROSSITER THAXTER. 4 vols. 12mo, Muslin, $3 00; Half Calf, $6 00.

Burr's Memoirs, with Miscellaneous Correspondence, Notes by M. L. DAVIS. Portrait. 2 vols. 8vo, Muslin, $3 00; Half Calf, $5 00.

Burr's Private Journal, during his Residence in Europe; with Selections from his Correspondence. By M. L. DAVIS. 2 vols. 8vo, Muslin, $3 00; Half Calf, $5 00.

Carlyle's History of Frederick the Great. 4 vols. 12mo, Muslin, $1 75 each; Half Calf, $3 00 each. Vols. I. and II., with Portraits and Maps, now ready.

Carlyle's French Revolution. 2 vols. 12mo, Muslin, $1 00; Half Calf, $2 00.

Carlyle's Oliver Cromwell. 2 vols. 12mo, Muslin, $2 00; Half Calf, $3 00.

Carlyle's Past and Present. Chartism and Hero-Worship. 12mo, Muslin, $1 00; Half Calf, $1 50.

Chalmers's Life and Writings. 4 vols. 12mo, Muslin, $1 75 vol.; Half Calf, $3 00 per Set.

Chalmers's Posthumous Works. Edited by his Son-in-law, Dr. WILLIAM HANNA, LL.D. Complete in 9 vols. 12mo, Muslin, $1 00 each; Sheep extra, $1 25 each; Half Calf, $2 00 per Set.

PRICE REDUCED.—From the Fall of Napoleon in 1815, to the Accession of Louis Napoleon, in 1852. 8 vols. 8vo, Muslin, $6 00; Sheep extra, $8 00; Half Calf, $12 00. The 4th and concluding volume, with copious Analytical Index, will be ready in a few days.

Alison's Military Life of John, Duke of Marlborough. With Maps and Plans. 2 vols. 8vo, Half Calf, $3 50.

Atkinson on Oriental and Western Siberia. A Narrative of Seven Years' Explorations and Adventures in Siberia, Mongolia, the Kirghis Steppes, Chinese Tartary, and Part of Central Asia. By JOHN ATKINSON. Illustrated by Engravings on Wood, and Maps. 1 vol. 8vo, Muslin, $5 00; Half Calf, $4 00.

Barth's Travels and Discoveries in North and Central Africa. Embodying the Results of Illustrated. This only complete American Edition. 3 vols. 8vo, Muslin, $6 00; Half Calf, $9 00.

Bancroft's Literary and Historical Miscellanies. 8vo, Muslin, $2 50; Half Calf, $4 00.

Barnes's Notes on the New Testament. For Bible Classes and Sunday-Schools. Maps and Engravings. 11 vols. 12mo, Muslin, $11 00; Half Calf, $17 00 per Set. The Volumes are separately.

Blackstone's Commentaries on the Laws of England. With Notes Explaining the Text, Work to the American Student. By JOHN L. WARREN, late Chief Justice of New York. 4 vols. 8vo, Law Sheep, $7 00.

Boswell's Life of Dr. Johnson. Portrait of Boswell. 2 vols. 8vo, Sheep extra, $3 00; Half Calf, $4 00.

Brodhead's History of the State of New York. First Period, 1609-1664. 8vo, Muslin, $3 00; Half Calf, $4 00.

Bunting's (Rev. Dr. Jabez) Life. With Notices of Contemporary Persons and Events. By his Son, THOMAS PERCIVAL BUNTING. Vol. 4., with Portrait. 12mo, Muslin, $1 00.

Burke's Complete Works. With a Memoir. Portrait. 8 vols. 8vo, Sheep extra, $6 00; Half Calf, $9 00.

Burton's Life and Works. Edited by ROSSITER THAXTER. 4 vols. 12mo, Muslin, $3 00; Half Calf, $6 00.

Burr's Memoirs, with Miscellaneous Correspondence, Notes by M. L. DAVIS. Portrait. 2 vols. 8vo, Muslin, $3 00; Half Calf, $5 00.

Burr's Private Journal, during his Residence in Europe; with Selections from his Correspondence. By M. L. DAVIS. 2 vols. 8vo, Muslin, $3 00; Half Calf, $5 00.

Carlyle's History of Frederick the Great. 4 vols. 12mo, Muslin, $1 75 each; Half Calf, $3 00 each. Vols. I. and II., with Portraits and Maps, now ready.

Carlyle's French Revolution. 2 vols. 12mo, Muslin, $2 00; Half Calf, $3 00.

Carlyle's Oliver Cromwell. 2 vols. 12mo, Muslin, $2 00; Half Calf, $3 00.

Carlyle's Past and Present. Chartism and Hero-Worship. 12mo, Muslin, $1 00; Half Calf, $1 50.

Chalmers's Life and Writings. 4 vols. 12mo, Muslin, $1 75 vol.; Half Calf, $3 00 per Set.

Chalmers's Posthumous Works. Edited by his Son-in-law, Dr. WILLIAM HANNA, LL.D. Complete in 9 vols. 12mo, Muslin, $1 00 each; Sheep extra, $1 25 each; Half Calf, $2 00 per Set.

PRIZE SERIES.—From the Beginning of the Reign of George III. to the Battle of Waterloo. 2 vols. 8vo, Muslin, $3 00; Sheep, $3 75; Half Calf, $5 00.

Coleridge's Complete Works. With an Introductory Essay upon his Philosophical and Theological Opinions. Edited by Professor SHEDD. Portrait in 7 Vols. Portrait. Small 8vo, Muslin, $7 00; Half Calf, $12 50. The 7th vol. now ready.

Vol. I. Aids to Reflection.—Subsidium Theologiæ.—II. The Friend.—III. Biographia Literaria.—IV. Lectures on Shakspeare and other Dramatists.—V. Literary Remains.—VI. Special Lay Sermons and Table Talk.—VII. Poetical and Dramatic Works.

Crabb's English Synonyms. 8vo, Sheep extra, $2 00; Half Calf, $3 00.

Creasy's Fifteen Decisive Battles of the World: from Marathon to Waterloo. 12mo, Muslin, $1 00; Half Calf, $1 50.

Curran and his Contemporaries. By STERLING COYNEY. 12mo, Muslin, $1 00; Half Calf, $1 50.

Geo. Wm. Curtis's Works.

THE POTIPHAR PAPERS. Illustrated from Drawings by Hoppin. 12mo, Muslin, $1 00; Half Calf, $1 50.

PROUE AND I. 12mo, Muslin, $1 00; Half Calf, $1 50.

LOTUS-EATING. A Summer-Book. Beautifully Illustrated from Designs by Hoppin. 12mo, Muslin, 75 cents; Half Calf, $1 00.

THE HOWADJI IN SYRIA. 12mo, Muslin, $1 00; Half Calf, $1 50.

NILE NOTES OF A HOWADJI. 12mo, Muslin, $1 00; Half Calf, $1 50.

De Tocqueville's Old Regime and the French Revolution. Translated by JOHN BONNER. 1 vol. 12mo, Muslin, $1 00; Half Calf, $1 50.

D'Israeli's Amenities of Literature. 2 vols. 12mo, Muslin, $2 00; Half Calf, $3 00.

Dante's Inferno. A Literal Prose Translation. By JOHN A. CARLYLE, M.D. 12mo, Muslin, $1 00; Half Calf, $1 50.

Draper's Human Physiology, Statical and Dynamical; or, The Conditions and Course of the Life of Man. Illustrated by Engravings on Wood. From Photographs. New Edition, 8vo, 600 pages, Muslin, $5 00; Sheep extra, $6 00; Half Calf, $7 00.

Dryden's Complete Works. With Life by SCOTT. Portrait. 8 vols. 8vo, Sheep extra, $6 00; Half Calf, $9 00.

Dr. Turnbull's Theology, in a Series of Sermons. With Memoir of the Author. Portrait. 4 vols. 8vo, Muslin, $6 00; Sheep extra, $8 00; Half Calf, $12 00.

Miss Edgeworth's Tales and Novels. Complete in 10 vols. 12mo, Muslin, $10 00; Half Calf, $20 00. Vol. I. Harry and Lucy.

Ellis's Madagascar. Three Visits to Madagascar during 1853-1854-1856. Including a Journey to the Capital, with Notices of the Natural History, Productions, and Resources of the Country, and Observations on the Manners, Customs, Habits, and Superstitions of the People. By the Rev. WILLIAM ELLIS. With Maps and numerous Illustrations on Wood and Photographs. Complete and Revised Edition. 1 vol. 8vo, Muslin, $3 00; Half Calf, $4 00.

Forster's Lives of Eminent British Statesmen. 4 vols. 8vo, Sheep extra, $5 00; Half Calf, $7 50.

Fowler's English Language. Its Origin and History, Principles of Grammar, Authority in Use, Development, and a Full Grammar. New Edition, Revised and Improved. 12mo, Muslin, $1 00; Half Calf, $1 50.

Franklin's Life, Illustrated. With numerous exquisite Designs by DARLEY, and Portrait. 12mo, Muslin, $1 00; Sheep, $1 25; Half Calf, $2 00.

Gibbon's History of the Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire. With Notes, by Dr. H. H. MILMAN and M. GUIZOT. A New Edition, with Portraits and Maps. 6 vols. 8vo, Muslin, $9 00; Sheep extra, $12 00; Half Calf, $18 00. Containing all the Notes of Dr. Hues (uniform with Hume and Macaulay), Muslin, $1 00; Sheep extra, $1 25; Half Calf, $2 00.

Giesler's Church History. Translated, Main, and Enlarged by SAMUEL DAVIDSON, LL.D., and HENRY B. SMITH, D.D., Professor in the Union Theological Seminary, New York. Vol. I. Two Parts. 8vo, Muslin, $3 00; Sheep, $3 75; Half Calf, $5 00.

Gleig's Campaigns of the Duke of Wellington. Muslin, $2 00; Half Calf, $3 00 per Set.

Mrs. Hall's Child's History of the World; or, Biographical Sketches of all Distinguished Women, from the Earliest Ages to the Present Time. Edited by Two Ladies, with Selections from Female Writers of each Age. Illustrated by Engravings on Wood, from Designs by BECKER, J. CASSIDY. 8vo, Muslin, $2 50; Sheep extra, $3 00; Half Calf, $4 00.

Hallam's Historical Works. 4 vols. 8vo, Sheep extra, $5 00; Half Calf, $7 50. Or, 6 vols. 12mo, Muslin, $3 00; Half Calf, $6 00.

Hallam's (Rev. Robt.) Complete Works, Memoir by Dr. GRISCOM and Observations on his Character by Bishop POTTER. Portrait. Crown 8vo, Muslin, 4 vols. 12mo, Sheep extra, $6 00; Half Calf, $9 00.

Haven's Mental Philosophy including the Philosophy, Literature, and University Reform. Chief Text-Book in Colleges. Crowded, Voluminous, Enlarged, in Notes and Appendices. 8vo, Muslin, $2 50; Half Calf, $4 00.

Harper's Cyclopædia of Commerce and Commercial Navigation. By HUGH MCCULLOCH, M. P., SAMUEL HOWARD, Jr., ROYAL R. ORVIS, 1000 pages, double columns, Muslin, Sheep extra, $4 00; Half Calf, $5 00.

Harper's Dictionary of Classical Literature and Antiquities. Edited by WILLIAM SMITH, LL.D. 8vo, Muslin, $5 00; Sheep extra, $6 00; Half Calf, $8 00.

Harper's Dictionary of Classical Literature and Antiquities. Edited by WILLIAM SMITH, LL.D. Complete in 2 vols. 8vo, Muslin, $10 00; Sheep extra, $12 00; Half Calf, $18 00.

Harper's Dictionary of Classical Literature and Antiquities. Edited by WILLIAM SMITH, LL.D. Abridged from the Larger Work by the Author. 1 vol. 12mo, Muslin, $1 00; Half Calf, $1 50

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A FIRST-CLASS ILLUSTRATED PAPER.

THE BEST AND CHEAPEST

FAMILY NEWSPAPER IN THE WORLD.

FIVE CENTS A NUMBER; $2 50 A YEAR.

The First Number of the Fourth Volume of HARPER'S WEEKLY will appear on the 4th January, 1860. This year over 4,500,000 Numbers of HARPER'S WEEKLY will have been sold, nearly half of which will be found for reference. In commencing the new volume, the proprietors desire to state that it has been their aim to render HARPER'S WEEKLY, in the first place, a thoroughly reliable and impartial NEWS BEARER—a pictorial history of current events, equal to the daily press in fullness of intelligence, and superior to the daily press as containing illustrations with text. How far they have attained their aim, the three volumes now published will show. The illustrations in the Third Volume will scarcely need to be referred to, which every important event of the past year has been related and illustrated in the pages of HARPER'S WEEKLY. They would refer especially, in this connection, to The Indian War, the Great Eastern Steamship, the Harper's Ferry Outbreak, the Utah Expedition, the Paraguay Expedition, China, etc. etc. The value of the paper can be best realized by supposing that it did not exist, and by trying to conceive how little people would really know of passing events if they had to rely on weekly publications alone. In this respect, the arrangements for the coming year are more complete than they have been heretofore. HARPER'S WEEKLY has regular artist correspondents in almost every quarter of the globe, and commands the pencil of the first artists at home. It will moreover, in order to present itself as a complete illustrated history of our age, continue to transfer to its pages the best and most personally interesting portraits from foreign illustrated journals. In a word, the subscriber to HARPER'S WEEKLY—and it is increasing in its pages next year as accessible, well-driven, well-engraved, and well-printed picture of every memorable event which occurs, and a portrait of every man who attracts the general attention of the people of the United States.

HARPER'S WEEKLY will continue, as heretofore, to publish the best tales that are written by the best living American authors. It has already published A Tale of Two Cities, by CHARLES DICKENS—the most brilliant production of that brilliant writer's brilliant career; What will he do with it? by BULWER LYTTON; The Small Secret, by WILKIE COLLINS; Lady Lee's Widowhood, by MRS. GASKELL; A Good Fight, by CHARLES READE: it is now publishing Trevlyn Hold, by CHARLES GARVICE, and The Woman in White, by WILKIE COLLINS. Or, to before the conclusion of these tales, will commence, and will be concommenced, it being the intention of the publishers to secure every work of merit that appears in the best reviews here or abroad. It is hardly necessary to add, that the foreign serials which appear in HARPER'S WEEKLY are produced from their authors by the proprietors of HARPER'S WEEKLY, and, in many instances, give for a series a period of priority what amounts to a handsome copyright to the author.

In addition to serials, each number of HARPER'S WEEKLY will contain a short complete tale by some well-known author. In respect to these tales, as with the serials, the publishers will publish the best that they can obtain, without regard to their origin.

The other departments of HARPER'S WEEKLY will continue to receive careful attention at the hands of the publishers.

TERMS OF HARPER'S WEEKLY.

One Copy for Twenty Years $10 00
One Copy for One Year. 2 50
One Copy for Six Months 1 00
Five Copies for One Year 9 00
Twelve Copies for One Year 20 00
Twenty-five Copies for One Year 40 00

An Extra Copy will be allowed for every Club of TWENTY or TWENTY-FIVE SUBSCRIBERS.

Harper's Magazine and Harper's Weekly, together, one year, $4 00.

TERMS FOR ADVERTISING.—Fifty Cents a Line.

A LIBERAL DISCOUNT will be made to those wishing to Advertise for three Months or more.

☞ Persons living in the City of New York wishing "Harper's Weekly" left at their houses, will please send their names and residences, with the subscription money, to the Office of Publication.

Persons residing in the British Provinces will remit Twenty-five Cents in addition to their subscription, for the American Postage.

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS,
Franklin Square, New York.

☞ Every Number of HARPER'S MAGAZINE contains from 136 to 144 pages—and from 160 to 176 in the half-more-reading than any other in the country.

HARPER'S
NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE.

NUMBER CXVI.] CONTENTS. [JANUARY, 1860.

HOLIDAYS IN CASTA DIVA.—II. SAN JOSE. By THOMAS FRANCIS MADDEN.
Illustrated by Fourteen Engravings.

A LAY OF THE DANUBE.

RURAL PICTURES. Poem. By POETE CRAYON.
Illustrated by Twenty Engravings.

A PIPE OF TOBACCO.
Illustrated by Seventeen Engravings.

MRS. ANTHONY'S NEW YEAR'S PRESENT.

THE POET'S RECITAL.

THE ATOMS OF CUPIDO. By "HARRY GIBBON."

CARELESS LOVE-LETTERS. By "HARRY GIBBON."

THE CHRONICLES OF FALLAHASSEE.
BRIGANDS OF THE ADRIATIC.
HOW THE SNOW MELTED ON MOUNT WASHINGTON.
THE THREE GREAT VOYAGES.
THE BATTLE OF NEW ORLEANS.—A BALLAD OF LOUISIANA.
TUDY ON THREE STORIES IN ONE.
A CHRISTMAS HYMN.
MONTHLY RECORD OF CURRENT EVENTS.
LITERARY NOTICES.
EDITOR'S TABLE.
EDITOR'S EASY CHAIR.
EDITOR'S DRAWER.
EDITOR'S DRAWER.
SHADOWS OVER THE WAY.
THE DERELICT.
FASHIONS FOR JANUARY.
ILLUSTRATIONS.—Bad Costume.—Under-Sleeve.—Collar.

TERMS.

One Copy for One Year $2 00
Two Copies for One Year 3 00
Three or more Copies for One Year (each) . 2 00
And an Extra Copy, gratis, for every Club of TEN Subscribers.

HARPER'S WEEKLY and HARPER'S MAGAZINE, together, one year, $4 00.

The Postage upon "HARPER'S MAGAZINE" must be paid at the office where it is received. The Postage is Twenty-four Cents a year.

HARPER & BROTHERS, PUBLISHERS,
FRANKLIN SQUARE, NEW YORK.

Beautiful and Useful Books for the Holidays.

Published by HARPER & BROTHERS, Franklin Square, New York.

Stories of Rainbow and Lucky.
By JACOB ABBOTT. Beautifully Illustrated with Engravings on Wood. 4 vols. 16mo, Muslin, 60 cents per Volume. Uniform with the Ascensia Stories.
The Volumes may be obtained separately.
Just Ready.—HANDIE.—RAINBOW'S JOURNEY.

Abbott's Illustrated Histories.
The Volumes of this series are printed and bound uniformly, and are adorned with richly illuminated Title-pages and numerous Engravings. 16mo. Muslin, 60 cents per Volume. Muslin, gilt edges, 75 cents per Volume. The Volumes may be obtained separately.

CYRUS.
DARIUS.
XERXES.
ALEXANDER.
HANNIBAL.
JULIUS CÆSAR.
PYRRHUS.
JOSEPH AND HIS BRETHREN.
CLEOPATRA.
NERO.
HERNANDO CORTEZ.
ALFRED.
WALLACE THE CONQUEROR.
PETER THE GREAT.

The Young Christian Series.
By JACOB ABBOTT. Very greatly Improved and Enlarged. With numerous Engravings. Complete in 4 vols. 16mo, Muslin, $3 00; Half Calf, $5 83 each. The Volumes may be obtained separately.
THE YOUNG CHRISTIAN.—THE WAY TO DO GOOD.—THE CORNER-STONE.—HOARSEBAND AND MCDONALD.

Marco Paul's Voyages and Travels
In the Footsteps of his Father. By JACOB ABBOTT. Beautifully Illustrated. Complete in 6 vols. 16mo, Muslin, 60 cents each. The Volumes may be obtained separately.

IN NEW YORK.
ON THE CANAL.
IN THE FORESTS OF MAINE.
IN VERMONT.
IN BOSTON.
AT THE SPRINGFIELD ARMORY.

Franconia Stories.
By JACOB ABBOTT. Beautifully bound, engraved Title-pages, and numerous Illustrations. Complete in 10 vols. 16mo, Muslin, $6 00 per set. The Volumes may be obtained separately.

MARGUERITE.—STORYTELLER.
MARY BELL.—AGNES.
JEANIE DEANS.—ROSE ELMORE.
WALLACE.—HOUGHTON.
LAFAYETTE.—CAROLINE.

Kings and Queens.
Or, Life in the Palace. By JOHN S. C. ABBOTT. With numerous Illustrations. 12mo, Muslin, $1 00; Muslin, gilt edges, $1 25.

Pictorial Bible.
Harper's Illustrated and Non-Pictorial Bible. Embellished with Sixteen Hundred Historical Engravings, exclusive of Illuminated Borders, Maps, etc. Edited by J. A. ADDISS, more than Fourteen Hundred of which were designed expressly for it. 2 vols. 4to, Morocco, gilt edges, beveled and panneled sides, $20 00
Morocco Extra, gilt edges, full gilt back . . . 22 00
Full Calf embossed, gilt edges 20 00
Full Calf, Antique style, blank stamped . . . 18 00
Full Roan, marbled edges 12 00
Bound and Forwarded, carriage free, on receipt of the Money.

The Land and the Book.
Or, Biblical Illustrations drawn from the Manners and Customs, Scenes and Scenery of the Holy Land. By W. M. THOMSON, D.D. Twenty-five Years a Missionary of the A.B.C.F.M. in Syria and Palestine. With two elaborate Maps of Palestine, an accurate Plan of Jerusalem, and numerous Wood-cut Engravings, representing the Scenery, Topography, and Productions of the Holy Land, and the Costumes, Manners, and Habits of the People. Two Superb Large 12mo Volumes, Muslin, $3 50; Half Calf, $6 00; Half Calf extra, $8 50; Half Morocco extra, $9 00.

Self-made Men
By CHAS. C. B. SEWARD. Many Portraits. 12mo, Muslin, $1 25; Muslin, gilt edges, $1 37; Half Morocco, gilt edges, $2 50.

The Poets of the Nineteenth Century.
Selected and Edited by the Rev. ROBERT ARIS WILLMOTT. With Portraits on Steel, engraved by ROBERT J. DUTCHER, Editor of "Cyclopædia of Literature," Illustrated with upwards 120 Engravings, drawn by eminent Artists, including Birket Foster, W. Harvey, Harrison Weir, J. E. Millais, D. Maclise, W. Mulready, C. Stanfield, J. Gilbert, F. R. Pickersgill, J. Tenniel, T. Dalziel, J. H. Hill, F. W. Fairholt, F. O. C. Darley, and others. In elegant small 4to form, printed on Superfine Toned Paper, cloth bevel sides, cloth extra, gilt edges, Three Dollars; Full Turkey Morocco, $5 50.

Franklin's Life, Illustrated.
Autobiography of Benjamin Franklin. With a Sketch of his Public Services, by Rev. H. H. WEBB. With numerous engraving Designs. By JOHN GILBERT. 12mo, Muslin, $2 00; Sheep extra, $2 25; Muslin, gilt edges, $2 25; Half Calf, $3 00; Full Turkey Morocco, $4 00.

Goldsmith's Poetical Works.
Illustrated by Wood Engravings, from the Designs of W. C. T. DOBSON, R.A., and F. TAYLER, J. C. HORSLEY, R. REDGRAVE, A.R.A., and Frederick Taylor. With Memoir of the Author, by JOHN FORSTER, Biographical Memoir, and Notes on the Poems. Edited by Rossiter Cleveland. 8vo, Muslin, gilt edges, $2 50; Turkey Morocco, gilt edges, $4 50.

Harry's Summer in Ashcroft.
Illustrated. 16mo, Muslin. Square 40s, Muslin, 60 cents.

Woman's Record;
Or, Biographical Sketches of all Distinguished Women, from the Creation to the Present Time. Arranged in Four Eras, with Selections from Female Writers of each Era. By MRS. SARAH JOSEPHA HALE. Illustrated with more than 200 Portraits, engraved by ROBERT J. LOBDELL. 8vo, Muslin, $3 50; Sheep extra, $4 00; Muslin, gilt edges, $4 00; Half Calf extra, $5 00; Half Morocco, gilt edges, $5 00; Full Turkey Morocco, $7 00.

Virginia Illustrated:
Containing a Visit to the Virginian Canaan, and the Adventures of Poete Crayon and his Cousins. Illustrated from Drawings by POETE CRAYON. 8vo, Muslin, $2 50; Half Calf antique, $3 50; Half Calf extra gilt, $4 00.

Old Whitley's Christmas Tree.
A Christmas Tale. By A. CASEY HALL. Beautifully Illustrated. Square 4to, Muslin gilt, 50 cents; Muslin, gilt edges, 60 cents.

Howitt's Homes of the British Poets.
Homes and Haunts of the British Poets. Illustrations. 2 vols. 12mo, Muslin, $2 00; Muslin, gilt edges, $2 50; Half Calf, $4 00; Full Turkey Morocco, $6 00.

Evenings at Home;
Or, The Juvenile Budget Opened. By Dr. AIKEN and Mrs. BARBAULD. With 54 Engravings by ADAMS. 12mo, Muslin, 75 cents; Muslin gilt edges, $1 00.

The Arabian Nights Entertainments.
Translated and Arranged for Family Reading, with Explanatory Notes. By E. W. LANE. Illustrated by 600 Engravings by HARVEY. 2 vols. 12mo, Muslin, $2 75; Muslin, gilt edges, $3 00; Half Calf, $4 45; Full Calf, $5 00.

Pilgrim's Progress.
By JOHN BUNYAN. With a Life of the Author, by ROBERT SOUTHEY, LL.D. Illustrated with 99 Engravings by ADAMS. 12mo, Muslin, 75 cents; Muslin, gilt edges, $1 00.

Fairy Book;
Containing Twelve new Stories, expressly Translated for this Work. With 31 fine Engravings, by ADAMS. 12mo, Muslin, 75 cents; Muslin, gilt edges, $1 00.

Flowers of Fable.
From Northcote, Æsop, Croxall, Gellert, Dodsley, Gay, La Fontaine, Lessing, Kniskel, Herder, Berquin, Gleditsch, etc. With numerous Engravings. 18mo, Muslin, 75 cents; Muslin, gilt edges, 21 00.

The Rose and the Ring;
Or, The History of Prince Giglio and Prince Bulbo. A Fireside Pantomime for Grand and Small Children. By Mr. M. A. TITMARSH (W. M. THACKERAY). Numerous Illustrations. Small 4to, Muslin, 50 cents.

Harry's Ladder to Learning.
With 250 Illustrations. Square 40, Muslin, 50 cents; Muslin, gilt edges, 60 cents.

Reading without Tears;
Or, A Pleasant Mode of Learning to Read. By the Author of "Peter Parley's Tales." &c. &c. Beautifully Illustrated. Small 4to, Muslin, 50 cents.

Harper's Story Books.
A Series of Narrative, Biographies, and Tales, for the Instruction and Amusement of the Young. By JACOB ABBOTT. Embellished with more than 1000 Beautiful Engravings.
Some of the Story Books are written particularly for Girls, and others for Boys, and the different Volumes are adapted to various ages, so that the work forms a complete Library of Entertaining for all the Children of the Family and the Sunday-School.
THESE "HARPER'S STORY BOOKS" can be obtained complete in Twelve Volumes, bound in blue, each one containing Four Tales, at the price of Two Dollars, or in Thirty-six Tilt Volumes, bound in red, each containing One Story, at the price of Fourteen Dollars and Forty Cents.

Harper's Fireside Library.
A choice collection of books, chiefly American, expressly adapted to the Domestic Circle, Sabbath-Schools, etc. 300 Books; 375 cents each; Muslin, gilt edges, 45 cents each.
AIDEN'S ALICE GORDON; or, Uses of Orphanage.
AIDEN'S LIFE OF MARTIN LUTHER.
AIDEN'S YOUNG SCHOOLMISTRESS.
ALEXANDER'S (Mrs.) Lessons of Life.—The Mother's Trials.
ALEXANDER'S (Mrs.) Wife.
MATHEW'S GOOD GENIUS THAT TURNED EVERYTHING TO GOLD.
ELLIS HENRIETT; or, Family Changes.
WILLIAM AND MARY.
THE MAGIC OF KINDNESS. By the BROTHERS MATHEW.

Dickens and Bonner's Child's Histories.
A CHILD'S HISTORY OF ENGLAND. By CHARLES DICKENS. 2 vols. 16mo, Muslin, 60 cents.
A CHILD'S HISTORY OF THE UNITED STATES. By ROBERT BONNER. With Illustrations. 16mo, Muslin, $1 00.
A CHILD'S HISTORY OF ROME. By JOHN BONNER. With Illustrations. 2 vols. 16mo, Muslin, $1 00.
A CHILD'S HISTORY OF GREECE. By JOHN BONNER. With Illustrations. 2 vols. 16mo, Muslin, $1 00.

Life of Christ,
In the Words of the Evangelists. A Complete Harmony of the Gospel History of our Saviour. For the use of Young People. Illustrated with 39 Fine Engravings by ADAMS, from Designs by CHAPMAN and Others. 16mo, Muslin, gilt, 75 cents; Muslin, gilt edges, $1 00.

Robinson Crusoe.
The Life and Surprising Adventures of Robinson Crusoe, of York, Mariner; with a Biographical Account of the Author. Illustrated by Engravings by ADAMS. Complete Edition. 12mo, Muslin, 75 cents; Muslin, gilt edges, $1 00.

Footprints of Famous Men.
By JOHN G. EDGAR. With Illustrations. 16mo, Muslin, 60 cents; Muslin, gilt edges, 75 cents.

Boyhood of Great Men.
By JOHN G. EDGAR. With Illustrations. 16mo, Muslin, 60 cents; Muslin, gilt edges, 75 cents.

History for Boys;
Or, Annals of the Nations of Modern Europe. By JOHN G. EDGAR. With Illustrations. 16mo, Muslin, 60 cents; Muslin, gilt edges, 75 cents.

The Wars of the Roses;
Or, Stories of the Struggle of York and Lancaster. By J. G. EDGAR. Illustrations. 16mo, Muslin, 60 cents.

 HARPER & BROTHERS will send either of the above Works prepaid by the Mail, postage paid, for any distance in the United States under 3000 miles on receipt of the Money. The Bible cased and is rendered by express.

HARPER & BROTHERS,
327 to 335 Pearl Street (Franklin Square), New York.
Publish this Day:

RAINBOW'S JOURNEY.

Being the Second Volume of

Stories of Rainbow and Lucky.

By JACOB ABBOTT.

BEAUTIFULLY ILLUSTRATED.

16mo, Muslin, 60 cents.

"HANDIE" and "RAINBOW'S JOURNEY" now ready.

II.

HARRY'S SUMMER IN ASHCROFT.

ILLUSTRATIONS.

Square 40s, Muslin, 60 cents.

Children are always pleased with the healthy freedom of country life; but they do not always know how to employ the long summer days, and parents have not always leisure to guide them in their amusements. The Publishers believe that in "HARRY'S SUMMER IN ASHCROFT" parents will find a book which they will be glad to put into the hands of their children as a help and incentive in such cases. The story of the employments and amusements of Harry and his sister Emma, during a spring and summer passed on a farm on the Hudson—of their planting, sowing, and cultivating flowers and garden vegetables, and their boating, fishing, and other country amusements, will, it is thought, be alike pleasant and instructive to young readers, and will not only suggest the order and employment of the garden and farm labors as children delight to, but also help them to an intelligent appreciation of the processes of nature which go on before their eyes.

The author has endeavored to unite amusement with instruction. He has aimed to show his young readers how to observe and what to observe, and thus to give them a combined and genuine interest in, and understanding of, the wise and wonderful works of God.

Believing that he has accomplished this purpose, the Publishers confidently recommend the book to parents as a pleasant companion to guide their children in the acquisition of valuable lessons.

III.

The Completion of Alison's History of Europe.

HARPER & BROTHERS, FRANKLIN SQUARE, N. Y.,
Publish this Day:

The 8th and Concluding Volume of

ALISON'S
History of Europe.

FIRST SERIES: From the Commencement of the French Revolution of 1789 to the Restoration of the Bourbons in 1815. 8 vols. 8vo, Muslin, $8 00; Sheep extra, $7 00; Half Calf, $10 00.

SECOND SERIES: From the Fall of Napoleon in 1815 to the Accession of Louis Napoleon in 1852. 4 vols. 8vo, Muslin, $8 00; Sheep extra, $7 00; Half Calf, $10 00.

☞ The Work Complete in 8 vols.,
Muslin, $13 00; Sheep extra, $14 00; Half Calf, $20 00.

☞ The Volumes sold separately.

"The merits of Dr. Archibald Alison as a historian need not be commented on in order to call attention to this important work. He brings industry, high culture indefatigable perseverance, an active and elegant mind, and rare powers of description, to the accomplishment of a task in which he evidently takes a cordial delight. Entering his work as an elaborate defense of the events of the age, accompanied with frequent vivid and expressive portraitures of conspicuous scenes, it must be regarded as a welcome contribution to our resources on European history, and as an indispensable aid to the studies of every intelligent reader."

☞ Sent by Mail, postage prepaid, on receipt of price.

Harper's
Holiday Pictorial
Now Ready.

The most beautiful Pictorial Sheet ever issued.

PRICE SIX CENTS.

Sent by mail anywhere in the United States on receipt of the price.

HARPER & BROTHERS, Franklin Square, N. Y.

Agents Wanted

To obtain Subscribers for

LOSSING'S
PICTORIAL FIELD-BOOK OF THE REVOLUTION.

In Two Volumes Royal Octavo, containing upward of

1500 Pages and

1100 Beautiful Illustrations.

This work will be SOLD EXCLUSIVELY BY AGENTS, to each of whom a liberal District will be given. Those Subscribing Early will be supplied with Specimen Numbers, and Circulars, containing full particulars, free of charge. For full particulars address, if in the United States, HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

A Christmas Surprise Party.

1. Messrs. Jones and Smith, and their wives, think it would be a capital idea to give old Mrs. Jinks a surprise party.

2. They present themselves accordingly at the Jinks domicile with a strong brass band, just as Mrs. Jinks has tied her night-cap strings.

3. Dancing is at once commenced with vigor, and hilarity is the order of the night.

4. Which so startles the neighbors that they begin to ring bells and fire pistols, to frighten away the supposed burglars.

5. Signor Rorotini volunteers a song.

6. And amiable Mrs. Sneak avails herself of the opportunity to inspect the Jinks domestic arrangements very minutely.

7. Supper hour having arrived, that meal is dispatched with alacrity and appetite.

8. Stout Miss Jones retires with a glass of Champagne to a cool little entry room, and seats herself on what looks like a comfortable ottoman.

9. As for the gentlemen, they retreat into Mrs. Jinks's dressing-room, to smoke a quiet cigar.

10. The wine and the excitement lead to some trifling accidents, which cause a good deal of merriment.

11. While a little practical business is transacted by a vigilant burglar who has been watching the scene.

12. The appearance of the Jinks' drawing-room next day is admirably calculated to console Mrs. Jinks for the surprise of the previous night.

The New Fashions for 1860.

"HOOPS, AS IS KNOWN, ARE GOING OUT, AND LARGE HATS, HIDING THE FACE, ARE COMING IN. I SUPPOSE THE HORRID MEN WILL GET ON THEIR KNEES TO STARE AT US."

"LARGE NECK-TIES ARE COMING IN AGAIN, AND IT WILL BE SO DELIGHTFUL TO DANCE WITH A MAN DRESSED IN THE HEIGHT OF THE FASHION."

[From our Young Lady Chronicler of Fashion.]

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

A JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION

VOL. III.—NO. 157.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, DECEMBER 31, 1859. [PRICE FIVE CENTS.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1859, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

"A HAPPY NEW YEAR!"

NEW-YEAR'S DAY.

BY CHARLES STEWART.

Our merry wings Hope's rapid heights display,
Proclaim the advent of the glad New Year,
And from afar the Old Year, pale and dying,
Flags his white sword and totters to his bier.
Then hurrah! hurrah! for the glad New Year,
With warm his throne with a shout;
Who welcomes Hope with a hearty cheer
And shuts out Sorrow out.

Bells are ring'd, and gay, very gay singing
Pleiades fast and free;
Joy sparkleth, wine dogling
New Year's Jubilee!

Behold the broad river in joyous array,
Like shadows the shores their stiff array:
Bright faces uplifted
Bloom every where,
As angels had alited
The sunshine there.
All light and music, and all life and motion;
Enchanting spell of beauty and of bliss,
Oh! it, layered vision
Oh! what a glad hour day is this!
Old winter flies from her happy heart
Feels as from a prison from cowhid must—
A power of youth,
And a will to do!
From the laughing bay at the border's blaze;
And also old dogs,
With his face so sage,
Will star with linos 'n an ancient pace,
Grown crafty as pools in the sunny rays.
And the voices in the sky,
How are we not one with them?
But, high or low, are happy as the day is long!
Little tongues are still,
With a glad "My New-Year's gift!"
And "A happy, happy New Year!" is the burden of his song.

May this year, as bright in youth,
Bright and lovely!
And that many vanquish Might let us always hope
and pray.
Thus God bless you, reader dear,
May you find the ending year
Ever bright, and always happy as this first auspicious day.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 31, 1859.

1859.

THE year one thousand eight hundred and fifty-nine, which will close before another number of Harper's Weekly is issued, has been in some respects more memorable than many previous years for the last quarter of a century. It will figure conspicuously in history, not only from the intrinsic importance of the events it witnessed, but from the dramatic completeness of several of the movements which took place between its January and its December.

It will be remembered, in this country, as the year which inaugurated the final resettlement of the Kansas dispute, and the general acquiescence of all moderate men in the Douglas doctrine that Territory, like States, have a right to prescribe their own domestic institutions. It left for future Congresses to determine at what period an unformed mass of people in a Territory in the sense implied in the above statement of doctrine is but the principle more admitted, such matters of detail can involve but little difficulty. At the very earliest indication of any considerable population, for instance, as the inhabitants of a Territory can elect a delegate to Congress—the privilege of designating their institutions may be safely and obviously accrue. It was hoped by many that this settlement would for a time calm the violence of the slavery controversy, and that if John Brown raid into Virginia, and the reluctance of the South to submit to the legislative predominance of the more populous North, seem, at the last hour of the dying year, to have revived the controversy in its most bitter shape, still we take leave of 1859 with angry threats of dissension singing in our ears, and fierce menaces of civil war disturbing the composure which the rest of the country, in the year 1860 will witness a calmer and more practical frame of mind among our statesmen. Meanwhile let no pugnacious menaces look there has been tangible progress in this Slavery conflict since 1858.

In Europe, 1859 will be chiefly remembered as the year of the Italian war. It was on New-Year's Day, 1859, that Napoleon first intimated his purpose of attempting to solve the Italian problem, if need be, with the sword. Austria would not yield to fair, and accordingly, as soon as the weather permitted, the armies took the field. The result was the total overthrow of Austrian power in the Italian peninsula. With a sagacity peculiarly his own, Napoleon made peace as soon as his moral object was gained. After Solferino the result in the affairs in Italy was gone forever, and Napoleon laid down the sword—pan-bing Venice, not unjustly, for the selfish and narrow-minded manner in which she had held aloof from Lombardy and Piedmont in 1848. Ever since then Italy has been in a transition state. Lombardy and the Duchies have proved their capacity for self-government at their intelligent patriotism by a policy so enlightened, so resolute, and yet so forbearing, that it is without parallel in the history of suddenly enfranchised nations. Their future is safe. The Pope still remains—an unsolved, almost hopeless puzzle. Without foreign troops to protect him the old man's throat would not be safe ten minutes among his own people; and yet he never was so absolutely set on by a power as this old gouvernment, never blinder to his true position among nations. Holding power and life at the will of foreign armies, and actually late Louis Napoleon in France, suffers crazy Irishmen to quicken his British by eulogies of his lawful dynasty—and exasperated his unfortunate people by the Mordara outrage—a villainy so infamous that it could hardly have been endorsed in the dark ages. His standing right of Italy is gone, this inveterate stability should presage the end of papal dominion. No venerable old institution has ever so willingly see it trampled in the dust. But Pius the Ninth seems bent on his doom; and well may he be called the Destroyer of the Papacy in the nineteenth century of Italy. If he will destroy himself, if he will not permit the Emperor to save him, why, let him perish by his own.

Of the rest of Europe the history of 1859 will say little. France is unchanged; more loved than ever, and more feared by every other nation; but with a government so thorough and so well administered, so just as between man and man, so considerate of the interests of all, Germany has recovered from the convulsions of terror into which it was plunged by the war; except in the husbandry of Austria and Prussia—a story—it attracts no outside attention. Russia, peaceful and active, builds railroads and emancipates serfs—a splendid example on every side. Spain closes the year with a declaration of war against African neighbors, whom it will crush out, and whom, on account of their historical antecedents, the world will not pity. With regard to Great Britain, it will take the year to have buried in the tear of the Great Terror about a French Invasion. The course of the English during the Indian or political questions of the day has somehow attracted the ill-will of both or all parties, and ever since then have been alternately quailing and insulting before the enemies from France—the very last thing any sane Frenchman would contemplate. Meanwhile Ireland has continued to improve, and to be more and more to the English people than foreign politics) has remained stationary.

The year 1859 will be memorable for important changes in Asia. The Indian mutiny has been outwardly quelled. A change in the form—but no change in the substance—of the British Government in India has taken place, and a chronic financial crisis has succeed to the wars. Fresh alleged, but wrong annexations have given enormous expensive now thrown on the Government, are imperative. China has again thrown down the gauntlet to the West, and war in the new war is commencing, with no great prospect of present results. Experience shows that our intercourse with China is not likely to be of the trusted beyond the range of British or American cannon. Nothing short of the armed occupation of Pekin can enforce it. This is not likely to be soon effected, and is likely to become a safe intercourse with the people of that empire.

In Japan, however, is, as usual, a prey to revolution. Paraguay has made nominal amends for her outrages on our citizens, and a treaty for her future conduct is on the point of signature. War and revolution rage at Buenos Ayes, in Chili, in Venezuela, New Granada, and Bolivia. Brazil alone pursues a tranquil course of prosperous commerce. Mexico continues to be the prey of the priesthood and the Church of the Church, now under that of the Liberals; several United States citizens have been murdered with impunity, and we have not yet received a final solution of the difficulty as to our statement as ever. Nicaragua sinks into insignificance, and keeps clear of revolutions. Peru, on the contrary, pursues a peaceful career, increasing yearly in population and wealth.

In the United States 1859, has slowly recovered from the crisis of 1857. The year 1858 was one of liquidation; 1859 witnessed the beginning of many of our forties. But for the crisis, which checked all mercantile operations, the work would have now been far advanced as it is, much within a few years of completion. The financial money has been cheap at all the financial centres, and very few new enterprises have been undertaken. As a general rule, the industries of trade have been dull both in England and in the United States. Over-importations deprived many of our foreign merchants of their usual profits on their dealings last fall; the prospect is fair for still more serious losses from the same cause next spring. Should the mercantile world enjoy another year of tranquility, and no check to remunerative gains from financial embarrassments on the part of banks and other connected institutions, 1860 will leave us well prepared for a period of great commercial activity. Thank Providence, the crops of 1859, both North and South, were unusually bountiful; both cotton and breadstuffs are abundant, and command prices which counteracts the growers handsomely. With this basis to go upon, our commercial future would be sure were the banks and the importers kept within the bounds of moderation.

THE LATE HON. THEODORE SEDGWICK.

We were in hopes that we should have been able to present our readers with a portrait of the late Hon. Theodore Sedgwick, who was for a long period a co-laborer of ours in this journal. But neither Mr. Sedgwick's family nor his friends possess any likeness of the deceased; to the last of our belief no authentic portrait of him is in existence. Many years ago, when he actually held office, Mr. Sedgwick to have his likeness taken for our use. His laughing refusal, declaring that we should not publish him with his consent. His modesty prevented other friends from obtaining the same favor.

Mr. Sedgwick was at this late day the last, literally, that the late Theodore Sedgwick was born in the year 1780. He was, in the very of eminence; his grandfather was the famous Chief Justice Sedgwick of Massachusetts, who was at one time Speaker of the House of Representatives, and subsequently a Judge of the United States Supreme Court. He was a lawyer of the old school—learned, quick-minded, and gifted with natural eloquence.

The late Mr. Sedgwick had attained his majority he went to Paris as Secretary of Legation under Mr. Livingston. There he enjoyed the society of many of the best men of the day, and contracted many friendships which lasted throughout his life. The late Daniel De Tocqueville, among others, he was closely intimate; they corresponded regularly until his death. De Tocqueville had come into office, Mr. Sedgwick was one of the few persons to whom he confided his melancholy foreboding of the fate of the future of France. His illness welcomed into the last society in England—Lord Macaulay, Hallam, Grote, Milman, and other leaders of the British bar he was on terms of delightful intimacy. No American was ever more welcome in London than he found that Mr. Sedgwick.

On his return to this country he commenced the practice of the law, in which he soon attained a large and lucrative practice. In the midst of it, he indulged his literary aptitudes by writing for the "North American Review" and by editing two legal works "On the Measure of Damages" and on "Constitutional Law," both of which are valuable. These latter were eminently successful, and are now text-books, not only in this country but in England and France. On the political questions of the day he wrote copiously, and with his usual force in the columns of the New-York Evening Post. Politically he was in politics a conservative, or National Democrat, but with none of the party bitterness so often connected with Politicians. He carried among his intimate friends many members of the Republican party, and all of the political documents made by Mr. Buchanan in this section now was more popular with all parties than that of Mr. Sedgwick in the Cabinet. Before District Attorneyship, he took a lively interest in every movement which had for its object the development of civilization; he was, as is known, President of the New York Crystal Palace, and took a prominent part in many other similar undertakings.

If we were to seek to characterize his political life, we should say that he was a man of true principles. He was a practical man—trained and bred in the practical school, and always ready to sacrifice theories to the rule of practicability results. He believed that all human governments were based on certain principles and certain maxims; and that an attempt to build up a society or a nation on an abstract ineffable doctrinal basis was the height of folly, despotism and revolution. Hence his course on the great controversy which raged in the country from 1850 to 1856. He opposed him to the malignant abuse of extremists, was as fair golden opinions from conservatives on all sides. He never received him more than the senseless abuse of political opponents which used to be poured out upon Washington, Jefferson and the Pierce Administration. "Such a paper," he used to say, "is a nuisance and a disgrace to the country."

He was decorously attached to his profession, which he loved for its own sake, and in which, from the election of judges filled him with disgust, and he labored faithfully and energetically to have the system changed. He was a rivalist of the bar in his ways spoke with appreciative kindness; no one more popular than the late Charles O'Conor, Van Buren, Field, Brady, or Noves more heartily than he. His own legal abilities were good, though, latterly, ill-health had prevented him from a love of business, denied him more inefficient to practice than he had been at an early age.

He was emphatically a gentleman, in the old sense of the term. He loved the society of the finest, the elegant, the polished. The virtues and frauds of politics he shrank from with horror. No party convention ever saw him lose his temper, or conceal his sentiments, or adopt a subterfuge, or hide his loathing of rufflanism and profligacy. He was a man to be loved, to be honored, to command race or faith; but, as might have been expected in Sedgwick, he chose his own society, and chose it well.

For many months he may have foreseen his impending death. The death of his wife, which was taken from him a couple of years since, affected him very severely. He was subject to attacks of that most terrible disease—neuralgia—and soon months before he died was incapacited from attending to business. Not many weeks since he called on us, and laughingly observed that he came to make a contract to correspond for Harper's Weekly in Europe, as he must go abroad if he wanted to save his life. His last composition for the public era appeared in this journal. We have lost in him a most gifted and conscientious colaborer, and a powerful and vigorous writer.

Mr. Sedgwick died at Stockbridge, Massachusetts, at the old seat of his family, on 8th December, 1859. His decease has been noticed by all the courts in the city; his memory will be cherished as long as honesty, gentleness, and manhood are esteemed among the members of the bar.

THE LOUNGER.

NEW YEAR.

A HAPPY NEW YEAR! A happy New Year! And certainly the newest year ought to be the happiest of all years. And why? Because certainly, reckoning by the number of years, the world ought by this time to be a pretty happy old world. It has lived so long, and seen so much, and suffered so much! Truly, if there be any virtue in life, if it be not altogether sometimes and a vexation of spirit, the world ought by this time to have discovered a secret of happiness.

The world, what is it? Only you and me and a billion more. The world, of which we talk so lightly, as if it were a distinct something outside of us, is only something of which we are the constituent parts. When we are all, the world is all. When we are all happy, the world is happy. So if it is not a happy old world, whose fault is it? If it have fallen short of the secret of happiness, who is to blame?

A happy New Year! Yes, and it falls on Sunday this time—a double holiday. And in the next where, perhaps, you last love to sit; from the window, to which, perhaps, you love to look, there you will hear the golden words, that it is you who carry the secret of happiness in your own consciences.

The world is never to blame; it is only ourselves. If we fail, it is because we mistook success. If we do not succeed, it is because we looked for something outside instead of in us. The world is not what we externally get, but what we internally gain.

Let every man mend himself and the world will be mended. That will be a happy New Year all round!

FREE SPEECH.

In a country without an army of any importance the influence of public opinion must be upon the sense of law. And it fortunately happens that, as a people, we have a stronger feeling a surer instinct for law than any other. For this reason public opinion in danger only for some very different reason. Of course when they are excited there is no reason at all; but even then a firm, armed opposition in the interest of order and law is extremely calming.

In many a foreign city a mob is dangerous, because the intelligent classes who compose it as a mob, or rather more, to gain by social subversion or confusion than they have by letting things stay as they are. They are fighting for a change that really concerns their own welfare. But nobody fights very hard for a thing attracting, and the very few choice heroes in history. Nobody fights very hard because he is hired to do it by other people, who feel that their interests are attacked in some way.

Free speech of things provides a safety-valve of popular indignation in free speech. The right of the people peaceably to assemble and discuss their grievances is the right claimed on the practical good sense, as well as by political sagacity. If there were no such right, the people, in a wrongful pipe is always relieved by squirting.

And of course the first effort of despotism is the suppression of free speech. The British and Government of Virginia used to try it; and in doing it they lighted the matches of the flames of the Revolution. Grand old Patrick Henry used to thunder and lighten, down in Virginia, until the very air was charged with fire and sword in the sun. You remember the famous scene in the House of Burgesses. The orator was swinging about him the great sources of his eloquence, reminding the members and the King's Majesty of Cæsar, of Cromwell, and of the fate. "And George the Third—" said he. "Treason! treason! Mr. Speaker," cried a hundred voices. The orator waited until they had done. "And George the Third may profit by their example. If that be treason, make the most of it!" cried the triumphant orator.

It is a very old story, but a very good one, for it was just the spirit in which the speech of Vane, and James Otis in New England—of the Sons of Liberty in New York—of the Mecklenburg Convention in North Carolina—and of the Boston Committee in Georgia, that inspired the Revolution. And all these assemblies have been what the Revolution would have been incalculably delayed.

With our general intelligence, and the universal habit of reasoning and debating every great question, the right of free speech is unavoidably conceded. And, usually, fanatical, foolish, and a madman—but let him speak. It is a great deal better to know what he thinks and means, by his saying it, than by his acting it. The men who talk are only indirectly dangerous. It is the men who do who are the ones to be immediately feared.

Moreover the men who talk are they who believe unanly in moral, and not in material, influences. They are the conductors of popular public opinion, prevent a recourse to violence. Always of speech, as of the press—theoretically, fallacious will be, of course, becomes men are men. But an abuse of speech can be so bad as its repression. Look at Austria, Lombardy, Spain!

RAILROAD MANNERS.

ZOROASTER wishes to know whether it is not the duty of a conductor of a railroad train to keep order among the passengers—and whether he ought to allow a party of men to sit playing cards and shouting and screaming with laughter, when invalid women and children may be sitting in the same car.

Certainly the conductor ought to have that power, and he ought to exercise it. There seems to be no objection to a party of people playing cards in the car if they want to. But their loud laughing and shouting is an undoubted nuisance. If people are not allowed to smoke tobacco in the car, they certainly should not be suffered to be uproarious.

Perhaps all these little inconveniences and differences of sense of what is fair in a public carriage will gradually lead railroad companies to allow the passengers' money to buy the same choice which it buys in every thing else; so that if a party of friends or relatives wish to sit together and travel by themselves, without trailing their garments in good neighbor Bridget's saliva, or losing their seats when they step out for a drink of water, they may do so without being necessarily considered purse-proud aristocrats.

PARTING.

Oh! was I born in some wild year,
Whieh gives prophetic power,
That I no long should feel and fear
The coming of this hour?

I know such joy would flow to me
As never might be again:
I know this Love's intensity
Would bring me deadly pain.

All night the sea with weary roar
Told of its yearning duty:
All night I saw him pace the shore,
He could not rest or sleep.

My heart prayed all the holy night,
Although my lips were dumb:
I feared to greet the morning light,
I knew my hour was come.

In the broad day we calmly met,
Was with our sight and
Their solemn spell oppressed us yet,
Where all was gay and glad.

We could not part with idle jest,
With manner light and frank,
When life within our wild unrest,
And His without, a blank.

We gave one moment, and the last,
A silent prayer to pray—
To consecrate the sacred past,
That sighed to fly away.

One glance those features to entrance
Those smiles which once it wore,
Then covered up the sweet, dead face
With reverence sore more.

C. O. SIKESTRALLA.

NIGHTINGALE HOUSE, Nov., 1859.

WOMEN AND WORK.

A SUBJECT which has excited a great deal of discussion, and which has taken the various shapes are constantly recognizing more and more, has just received most thoughtful treatment, and therefore a treatment full of practical results, in a small hand-some volume of only 184 pages, by Mrs. Dall, published by Walker, Wise, & Co., Boston.

The question is not treated by her in the manner of the Woman's Rights Conventions, that is by declamation and appeals; but in a calm presentation of copious facts, lasted upon very careful study and observation. She is more a writer of books than that of thought. She is willing to allow for the pressure of habit and adverse taste. But starting from the fact, which is practical, that most of woman in the world have to support themselves, and that at least half of the hard work is done by them, she insists that the real problem is not so much money to help the needy—whether men or women—but to help them to help themselves. She shows from Dr. Sanger's terrible book of New York misery, and Mayhew's Statistics in London, and Duchatelet, and other eminent authorities, that the few avenues of employment open to women force upon her the fatal problem of Death or Dishonor: and then meeting the question boldly whether women are not poorly paid because they are poor workers, she shows that it is not so the difficulty lies in a want of respect for women as workers, based upon other considerations than their individual ability—and then a jealousy of them as the part of other laborers.

By showing what women have done, and what they are now doing, she reminds us how many spheres might be filled by them, and with great bravely into enumeration and detail: nor does she forget to allude to the moral amelioration of efforts that would accrue upon a more general application of women in the higher work of the world. The book concludes with some practical hints by which the young women of a happier fortune in life, and who are constantly asking what they can do in the matter, may find something to do. The whole work is prepared in the most earnest, practical, intelligent spirit. She does not forget that in the order of nature there are peculiar cares that fall upon women. But she does not also forget—what is so universally forgotten—that not merely women, whether mothers or not, the necessity of labor is nearly half. "EVERY employments are open to them," she says, "but all are underpaid." And she believes that they will always be underpaid until women of the higher classes, by engaging in some kind of work, create a respect for women's labor: and remember she is higher classes never will do this until "American men feel what all American men profess—a proper respect for labor as God's own demand upon every human soul."

The spirit of this little book is so candid, its tone is so earnest, and it is so thoroughly based on actual facts and comparisons, that it properly challenges the consideration of all thoughtful men and women. Whether you agree, or whether you differ, you will hardly deny, when you have read it, that this is the way in which the question is to be discussed.

MOB-LAW.

THIS is dangerous law because it is double-edged. It is a sword that can cut both ways. When people are much interested in a question, and divided into two parties, they will naturally be impatient of each other; but whichever throws the first brick is responsible for all the bricks thrown. A's hand is weaken to-day, but B's turn comes to-morrow.

If there are not two parties but only one man against a crowd, then the crowd carry it, of course. They break a head, but they build a party. For, say what you will, there is an instinct of fair play. If a big dog picks on a little one, every honest fellow helps the little one all he can; and if a man gets his head broken for saying what he honestly thinks, the same honest fellow instinctively says, "The man's a fool, but he has as good a right to think his thoughts and say them as any body else."

But, you ask, will a wise, patriotic man preach a mob?

Not if he can honestly help it. But to retire before the threat of a mob, what is that but to surrender the right of free speech, which in no particular case may be of no importance at all, but which as a principle is inestimable. What Mr. Jones thinks of any subject is probably indifferent to every body but Mrs. Jones and his family. But Jones is a citizen, and the first right of all citizens is to discuss all public matters; and if a mob say to Jones, "We don't care any thing about you, but we won't let you say what you think," then they do not threaten Jones, who is nobody, as much as the whole community, which is every body. Because if little Jones shall not say what he thinks, the mob will say, to-morrow, to that great man, Smith, that he shan't say what he thinks. And then where are you?

Where?

In a reign of terror.

Read Dickens's "Tale of Two Cities," and you will see precisely where you are. Instead of a tyrant, who is a serpent with one head, you have a tyrant who is a hydra—a serpent of many heads. And it is only a question of time when those heads shall be cut off. The French reign of terror was only a mob on permanence, and ruled until a beneficent cause put the finishing touch to the system of tyranny.

THE LOUNGER'S LETTER-BOX.

—E. M. S. The tribute to Irving is affectionate, but not suited for the Lounger.

—OBITUAL. Washington Irving was never married. Both Mr. Everett and Mr. Bancroft, in their remarks upon occasion of his death, allude to an early disappointment. Irving was engaged to be married, and the lady died. In his "Sweetest Abbey" he speaks of Byron and Mary Chaworth, and says that not only the unfortunate attachment, however grievous it may be to the heart, is of inestimable advantage to the poet. It is the unfailing well of sweet and bitter fountains.

—"A woman in White" is not the "Queen of Hearts." They are both by White Collins, who is also the author of "Antonina," "Armadale," and "The Dead Secret."

—EUCHRE DANTER begs us to add a "marble column" to the Weekly on the grounds following: to which Bath is to say:

"First. It is an active and healthy amusement.

"Second. It gives to the player, in different degrees of success, a greater perception and intuitive knowledge of human nature, cleanness, and rapidity in the operations of the mind, (for instance), which one strikes the other with greater or less velocity, that they may be ready at a call's in any pulmer manner.

"Third. When playing for keeps, it gives an artificial existence of loss and gain to boys who never learned it in any other way.

"Fourth. In case of disappointment in love or study, it has a tendency to remove timidity in oratorical powers, and enlarge the lungs."

—EUCHRE is a dilemma. He loved—perhaps loves—a lady. She loved him, and was to have his daguerreotype. He promised it, but was too occupied to do it, keep his promise? Eugene, say to her, with the L—— in your hand, and a smile on your lip, that you will be satisfied when I promised it, the picture and the original are at your feet. If not, say to her nothing, but write words; but you will find that the two little nots at the end will undo the great knot of the difficulty.

—T. N. P. Many thanks for your thanks for the verses but they are not quite the thing.

—WIDGLESWORTH asks what is the meaning of the verses of "Widgleswort to Nature" in the poem "Timothy Dobson, who drove a job-wagon between Cambridge, in England, and London, was born in 1756. He was a shrewd, honest man who made money: and seeing that students were fond of riding and driving he invested money in horses, and in time became the owner of the first man in England who ever let out hackney horses. He had forty horses, and it was there was no rival he did not do as close; and it was the rule of the stable that whenever cattle must take the horses into the door. Hence "this or none." Wigglesworth will find an interesting account of Dobson in Nichols's Anecdotes of Bibliography." Dobson was an old man of eighty when Milton went to Cambridge.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1859, by Harper & Brothers, in the Clerk's Office of the District Court for the Southern District of New York.

TRUMPS

BY GEORGE WILLIAM CURTIS

CHAPTER XC.

WRITING A HAND.

ARDE NEWT'S black eyes glared as he ran his fingers through his hair. Wayne Wyvern was now nothing, he heard nothing in the street: he was conscious of one very powerful sense of vengeance. Upon whom? For what?

He had been busy enough during the night hours of Lawrence Newt's absence in writing upon his skill. The first lesson he had given himself in exercise abolished him as a model of success. Business, society, dissipation, had wearied while they amused and occupied. There was a sense of latent rust all the time; a feeling that his real capacity was immured. He was vaguely conscious that his talent was a steam-engine turning a child's wind mill. As yet it was power without an adequate purpose.

Disaster conspired with ennui, disappointment, suspicion, and consequent hatred, to give him an object. From this night when he sat shrouded in absolute privacy, writing his uncle's name, he had plunged down a more precipitous descent of dissipation and desperation.

Hope Wayne had been impressed with this, not knowing how or why. Through her heart there swept sometimes a keen yearning of pity, like a half-muffled cry of despair across a bright placid day. She remembered that in all his career, so far as she knew it, there had seemed to be no holds for him as he dashed along. Like a victim slipping off a cliff, who can clutch no shrub, nor even seize the ground; like a man swept along a fresher, who can touch nothing but the raging stream, so he seemed to her wildly drifting from the beginning: no friendly hand, or heart, or voice unstretched to him, like a green bough, to grasp and swing himself to shore.

Why he more than another? What had Gabriel more than Abel? What had Lawrence? She answered her own question as she asked them; for she knew the Bennet home, and now she knew that Lawrence Newt had always exercised in his heart a keen image and memory, like a heaven-lighted lamp burning in a shrine. In her chamber at his thought and prayed, so she wept for Abel Newt. With her old friend Mrs. Spence she talked and wondered and planned and despaired to help him. Her old friend stimulated every effort; for she said to herself that Hope's order for Abel was only the invention of her own deep disappointment; and that she conquered her own grief by invently relieving the tragedy of another. "I will divert her mind, poor child. It will keep her heart from breaking."

At length Abel was satisfied with his own skill. He had succeeded in writing his Uncle Lawrence's name so perfectly that even his uncle himself might be deceived. It was the night after the dinner party, and he sat and bit excitingly and fiercely covering sheet after sheet of paper with the exact signature of Lawrence Newt.

"There is the key to my fortune," he muttered, as he rose and walked in his room. "That little line of ink opens your strong coffers, Lawrence Newt. That charm makes me your master. Now your insolent morality and domineering goodness shall be paid off. I am your master, Sir; your master, and through you the master of the woman whose pride scorns and tramples me. 'Men like you are not hard to fall,' he said, remembering Belch's note.

"And, after all, it is only a game," he resumed, still moving about his room, and opening and shutting his hand rapidly. "Every body plays; and the devil take the hindmost. If I can't overreach others they will overreach me, and they with their dependents, and so on to the man who grows the stuff from which the goods are made. Father was right enough at bottom. It's all one whether a man is cheated one way or another. Lawrence Newt's money is not mine. But, good Heaven! is a customer's money mine, any more, to whom I sell poor goods? It's only another turn of the cards; another trick in the game. The knave is trumps."

Still his hand played, the fingers worked, he seated himself, and the argument went silently on.

The night deepened and darkened without. The clouds hung heavily, blotting out the stars. The wind that stole along the streets and round the corners of the city began to moan, and whisper, and wail, and rise and die in long, hollow murmurs. Still the minutes passed, and it began to swell and beat as if it had substance like a sea, and were submerging the earth. It shook the windows and shook the casements and the blinds with rattling fury, and roared down the chimney, so that the smoke burst into the room affrighted, and hovered in tremulous clouds along the ceiling, shrinking from the blast. The night was in loud uproar, while the storm dashed and whirled and piled and drifted the snow that seethed, like foam, against the window, and completed the feeling of the sea.

With the sound of the snow came a sense of profound retirement—of deserted streets—of blinded, beleaguered travelers—of the whole world of life crouching and cowering away into its various lairs and homes, and at last a thought of utter solitude; as if life had ceased outside, and the very eye of eyes were forgetful and closed.

Abel Newt sat in grim apathy; partly conscious of the storm and of his own impression, but carefully following some argument in his mind of which he was a little actively aware.

Yet he rose, and going to the writing-table seated himself again, and with a perfectly firm hand covered another sheet of paper—after upon the back he wrote the name of Lawrence Newt—so that Hope Wayne herself would have been deceived, and thought it his own signature. Then he went quietly to bed.

CHAPTER XCI.

THE LOST IS FOUND.

THE guests arrived early at Lawrence Newt's dinner. They were not many, and they knew

A LOST LOVE.

So fair, and yet so desolate;
So weak, and yet so young;
Oh, there is grief too deep for tears,
Too wail'd for tell-tale tongue!
With a faded flower in her hair,
Poor little head, so white!
And dim blue eye, from her casement high
She looks upon the night.

Only a little rosebud—
Only a simple flower—
But it brought to me a sweet'ning
Through many a lone, lone hour.
As they float from her fever'd touch away,
The petals wither'd and brown,
All the hopes she deem'd too bright to be dream'd
Sink trembling and fluttering down.

It needs no bush of the Present
To call back the sweet calm Past;
The lightest summer murmuring
May be heard through the wintry blast;
And the wind is rough with sob and with sough
To-night upon gable and tree,
Till the note-less aloes wail like spectres pale,
And the pines like a passionate sea.

But she thinks of a dreamy twilight
On the garden walk below,
Of the laurels whispering in their sleep,
And the white rose in full blow.

The early moon had sunk away
Like some pale queen, to die
In the crisply thread of an opal cloud
To the June air's tremulous sigh.

All, all too frankly real;
The soft subdued eclipse,
Hand in hand, and heart in heart,
And the thrill of the wedded lips;
Those tender memories, how they Rich
Pale cheek and brow again,
Though time be changed, and lip estranged,
That swore such loving thou!

'Tis but the old, old story
Sung so often in vain:
For man all the freedom of passion,
For woman the calm and the pain.
Tell it the soul whose grief is rend
In the rear, pale sufferer fate,
It will still cling on to a love that is gone
With the warmth of its first embrace.

Oh, 'tis well for the careless spirit
To weave in the web of rhyme,
And prison the idle memories
That float on the breath of time;
But better for many an aching heart,
If ever it might to so,
To forget, for ever the light that has set,
And the dreams of long ago.

"MARTHA! YOU DID NOT COME TO ME!"

and loved each other. It was a whim of Lawrence's to give dinners; to have them good, and to ask only the people he wanted, and who he thought would enjoy themselves together.

"I was a long time in society," he said to Mrs. Bennet as they stood by the fire, "before I discovered that it was not society. There are a good many people who have not yet found it out."

Mrs. Bennet looked round the room and saw all that were dear to her. But as her eyes fell upon Edward Wynne talking earnestly to Ellen, the curious likeness of his face to that of her lost sister struck her so forcibly that she turned suddenly to her companion as if to ask a question.

His eyes were following hers; his mind was wondering how to effect what he was resolved to do.

The party was not large, Mr. and Mrs. Bennet, Gabriel, and May Newt; Edward and Ellen; Amy Waring, Hope Wayne, and Arthur Merlin.

In reply to Mrs. Bennet's glance Lawrence Newt looked so inquiringly that his companion, checking herself with equal suddenness, replied:

"No, I didn't say any thing."

At the same moment Hope Wayne was called out of the room. Amy Waring was busy with her, and looked very much perplexed when she heard the servant say that a lady wished to see Miss Wayne. But she looked much more perplexed, when, in a few moments, Hope returned with Fanny Newt. The murmur of the room was instantly hushed. May had told Gabriel; and her tender fingers had dressed Fanny and prepared her for a scene to which she was so long unaccustomed.

As Fanny entered there was the look of defiance in her eyes, as if she had put it on outside as an armor. But it melted and fell off when Lawrence came to her and shook her hand kindly and spoke a few words. Still she was silent and stiff, and looked on as if she were trying an experiment.

"I am glad Fanny is here," said Mrs. Bennet. "I do like to see families united."

"Yes," replied Lawrence, with his eyes fixed upon Edward—this time Mrs. Bennet followed his; "so often in the chances of life those who are separated and scattered, who are, indeed, as if dead are alive again, and are lost are found."

As he spoke he turned his eyes suddenly from Edward Wynne to Mrs. Bennet. They were evidently both thinking of the same thing.

"You," continued Lawrence Newt, answering a question which had not been asked, "I have often observed it. It is a mistake to believe."

They still looked at each other. Mrs. Bennet's lip trembled.

"Does it seem to you so very long ago that we used to play together, Lucia Darro?" he asked.

"No, and yet I have lived a life since then," she answered, and stopped as if something were left unsaid.

"So have we all," he replied; and involuntarily his eyes wandered away to Amy Waring.

And here were fastened upon him, and could not turn away as his met them, but gazed at him with a frank calmness that brought the tears into his, for he remembered Aunt Martha's words which had never been silent in his mind since she spoke them, but forever repeated themselves in ceaseless music, "Amy Waring loves you."

"How much," he said, quietly, as he turned to Mrs. Bennet, "Edward Wynne looks like your sister Martha!"

It was the first time Mrs. Bennet had heard her sister's name mentioned by any stranger for years. But Lawrence spoke so calmly and naturally as if Martha Darro had been the subject of their conversation.

"Poor Martha!" said Mrs. Bennet, sadly, "How mysterious it was!"

Her husband saw her as she spoke, and he was so struck by the mournfulness of her face that he asked quietly over.

"What is it?" he said, gently.

"For my son who was dead is alive again. He was lost and is found," replied Lawrence Newt, solemnly.

Mrs. Bennet looked troubled, startled, almost frightened. The words were full of significance, the tone was not in the melody. She looked at Lawrence Newt with incredulous eagerness. He shook his head assentingly.

"Alive?" she gasped rather than uttered.

"And well," he continued.

Mrs. Bennet closed her eyes in a silent prayer. A little sob or sweet stole over her matronly face that Lawrence Newt did not fear to say.

"And now you come with me!"

They left the room together; and Amy Waring, who had had not secret for the day as well as Hope Wayne, rose, to Hope's surprise, and followed her aunt from the room.

The three stopped at the door of Lawrence Newt's study.

"Your sister is here," said he, and Amy and he remained outside while Mrs. Bennet entered the room.

It was more than twenty years since they had met, and they clasped each other silently and wept for a long time.

"Martha!"

"Lucy!"

It was all they said; and wept again quietly.

Aunt Martha was dressed in sober black. Her face was very composed; it was a handsome that came with morbid zeal was mellowed, and the sadness of experience softened it.

"I have lived not far from you, Lucia, all these long years."

"Martha! and you did not come to me?"

"I did not dare. Listen, Lucia. If a woman has done a great deal of wrong, and has committed and gloried in the power of gratifying it—who conquered men and loved to conquer them—who was a woman of subtlety and of indomitable pride, should encounter—as how often they do!—a man who is her superior—and have been—believing that I had committed the unpardonable sin, and that no punishment could be painful enough?"

Mrs. Bennet looked alarmed.

"No, no; there is no remorse," said her sister, observing it.

"The sun came. I could not resist him. There was a form of marriage. I believed that it was I who had conquered. He left me; my child was born. I appealed to Lawrence Newt, our old friend and playmate. He promised me faithful secrecy, and through him I heard of the tent where Gabriel was at school. Then I withdrew from both. I thought it was the will of God. I felt myself commissioned to a living death. —Send to every friend and kinsman—dead to every thing but my stupendous sin and punishment; and yet consciously close to you, near to all old haunts and familiar faces—lost to them all—lost to my child." Her voice failed, and the tears gushed from her eyes. "But I persevered. The old passionate pride was changed to a kind of religious frenzy. Lawrence Newt went and came to and from India. I was utterly lost. I knew that my child would never know me, for Lawrence had promised that he would not betray me, and he disappeared from his view, gradually came to consider me dead. Then Amy discovered me among the poor souls she visited, and through Amy, Lawrence Newt; and by them I have been led out of the valley of the shadow of death, and set the blessed light of love once more."

She was entirely overcome, and bowed her head in uncontrollable emotion.

"And your son?" said her sister, half-smiling through her sympathetic tears.

"Will he yours also, May tells me," said Aunt Martha. "Thank God! thank God!"

"And Amy, who gave him his name?" asked Mrs. Bennet.

Aunt Martha paused for a little while. Then she said:

"You never knew why my—my—husband was?"

"Never."

"I remember—he never came to the house. Well, I gave my child almost his father's name. I called him Wynne; his father's name was Wayne."

Mrs. Bennet clasped her hands in her lap.

"And how wonderful! how wonderful!" was all she said.

Lawrence Newt knocked at the door, and Amy and he came in. There was so sweet and strange a light upon Amy's face that Mrs. Bennet looked at her in surprise. Then she looked at Lawrence Newt; and he cheerfully returned her glance with that smiling, musing expression in his eyes that was utterly bewildering to Mrs. Bennet. She could only look at each of the persons before her, and repeat her last words:

"How wonderful! how wonderful!"

Amy Waring, who had not heard the previous conversation, blushed as she heard her aunt speak, as if she had been alluding to something in which Amy was particularly interested.

"Amy," said Mrs. Bennet.

Amy could scarcely raise her eyes. There was an exquisite maidenly shyness overspreading her whole person. At length she looked the response she could not speak.

"How could you?" asked her aunt.

Poor Amy was utterly unable to reply.

"Coming and going in my house, my dearest child, and yet hugging such a secret, and holding your tongue. Oh Amy, Amy!"

These were the words of reproach, but the tone and look and impression of entire love and sympathy. Lawrence Newt looked calmly on.

"Aunt Lucia, what could I do?" was all that Amy could say.

"Well, well, I do not reproach you; I blame nobody. I am too glad and happy. It is too wonderful, wonderful!"

There was a fullness and intensity of emphasis in what she said that apparently made Amy suspect that she had not correctly understood her aunt's meaning.

"Oh, you mean about Aunt Martha!" said Amy, with the air of relief and surprise.

Lawrence Newt smiled. Mrs. Bennet turned to Amy with a fresh look of inquiry.

"About Gabriel and I. Of course about Aunt Martha. Why, Amy, what on earth did you suppose it was about?"

Again the overwhelming impossibility to reply. Mrs. Bennet was very curious. She looked at her niece and Martha, who was smiling intelligently. Then at Lawrence Newt, who did not cease smiling. If he were in no perplexity whatsoever. Then at Amy, who sat smiling at her through the tears that had gathered in the thoughtful depths of her brown eyes.

"Let me speak," said Lawrence Newt, quietly. "Why should it still be glad and happy with you? You have found a sister, Aunt Martha has found herself and a son, I have found a wife, and Amy a husband."

Before any body could speak there was another knock at the door. Lawrence opened it, and Edward Wynne and Ellen Bennet came in, with wondering eyes and smiles. The secret had been told to Edward some little time before by the eager Ellen, who had obtained an express dispensation from Aunt Martha, Amy and Lawrence Newt.

They saw at a glance that every thing was explained.

"Come," said Edward, "do you mean to leave us without any dinner except our own curiosity? There is a hungry and an curious people as you ever saw in the dining-room. Won't you come, and relieve them, Mr. Newt?"

"Wonderful! wonderful!" ejaculated Mrs. Bennet again, as the entrance of the blooming Ellen reminded her afresh of her happiness.

They went into the room where they had left the guests, and the story was quietly told to Hope Wayne and the others.

Hope and Edward looked at each other.

Ernest Malcom, who was said, in a low tone, putting out her hand.

Sister Edward the young man, blushing, and his large eyes filling with tenderness.

"And my sister, too," whispered Ellen Bennet, as she took Hope's other hand.

CHAPTER XCII.

REST.

HOPE WAYNE retired to her own room after the eventful dinner. Mrs. Simcoe was sitting up waiting, and greeted her kindly. But she saw some trouble in Hope's eye. She thought the evening-gle had been too much for her. But Hope was musing upon the strange chance which now called her aunt, indeceive her old friend as tenderly as she herself had been misled-ceived by her.

She threw off her cloak and stood by the side of Mrs. Simcoe, holding her hand.

"Aunty, let me see my father's miniature."

It was the first time she had asked for it, and the older woman carefully produced it.

Hope Wayne took it in her hands, while it still hung around her companion's neck. She looked for a long time at the handsome, heartless face, while all she knew of him passed slowly and vividly through her mind.

THE MINIATURE.

"And you believed him?" she asked at length, without raising her eyes.

"Hope, it is your father."

"Yes, but I am my mother's daughter," she whispered, almost inaudibly, but with a meaning that Mrs. Simcoe instantly felt. She meant to say she had but one parent.

"Let us be charitable, darling," whispered Mrs. Simcoe, in return, with a trembling, appealing pathos in her voice; "and I think," she added, slowly, almost inaudibly, and with a supplicating deference—"Yes, God help me, I think that he loved me."

Hope Wayne was silent. Must she, of all the world, say what must be said? Yet, if it must be said, how much better that loving lips should say it.

"Aunty, we are all so weak, whom can we trust but one?"

There was something holy in her aspect as she said the words. Her foreshadowing meaning seemed to trickle into the very soul of her companion, who replied with bowed head and piteous voice:

"What is it, Hope—what is it?"

Had Hope Wayne told her what she had learned about Aunt Martha and Edward Wynne. She told it as tenderly as a child consoles her stricken mother. The very tone of her words was balm to the wounds they made. And there was no resistance in the hearer. She sat still with the bowed head, and listened. And, as she listened, she wondered if it were necessary to her perfect trial that the last hope and dream of life should be torn away, and that the faith kept through long, silent years of martyrdom should be proved to be a delusion.

Motionless, bent, and as if breathless, she sat while Hope spoke, and after she was still. Hope Wayne thought of the handsome, heartless face that had been the secret of so many lives, and in the whirl of so many revelations she had scarcely time to remember her own disappointments and griefs.

After a long silence Mrs. Simcoe raised her head, and said, in a calm, untroubled voice:

"'Lord, I believe a rest remains!'" and repeated the whole of the familiar hymn.

While she was saying it Hope watched her with some apprehension. But it was needless. Mrs. Simcoe gently disengaged the locket from her neck, and held it while she was yet repeating the words, and when she had said the last she looked tranquilly at Hope.

"Every flux of every soul must be severed. I fear now as I look at this miniature, Hope, that I have worn it almost as a talisman. I have clung passionately—perhaps partly unconscious how strongly—to the image of a poor, weak man. I loved him while he lived. Since he died my life has been but a memory of him. I was divorced—" She stopped. The mutual sadness of the tone brought the hot tears to Hope Wayne's eyes. "Yes, I was divorced. But oh, Hope," she said, "be your own Goal!"

She bowed her head upon Hope's shoulder, and it seemed as if her frame would be rent by the convulsive sobs which burst from her. Hope soothed her as well as she was able; but the great torrent, the accumulated feelers of years must have its way, and it was long before she was tranquil. Then she said, placing the miniature in Hope's hand,

"It is yours now, darling. You are his child. And I—dearly, dearly loved him."

There was no more sobbing, and her eyes were dry.

"Come, Hope, dear, it is very late; let us go up."

They kissed each other and went up stairs.

"Those wings are his tender promise. That rest is the peace of heaven," whispered Hope, as Mrs. Simcoe stopped at the door of her room.

"I remember, darling—and I believe."

With these words Mrs. Simcoe closed her door.

DOMESTIC INTELLIGENCE.

CONGRESS.

On Monday, 19th December, in the Senate, the Vice-President being absent, Senator Fitzpatrick was elected President pro tempore by 33 votes, 19 being cast for Senator Hamlin. A resolution was granted to Senator Seward's Investigating Committee. Speeches on the slavery question were made by Senators Pugh, Davis, Lane, and Seward. On Tuesday, Senator Seward concluded his speech. He was succeeded by Senator Wilson, who spoke against Slavery. Hamlin and Logan, Republicans, voted for Senator Crittenden, as follows: For Sherman, 102; Brown, 30; Bingham, 31; Stallworth, 12. Mr. Brooks then, after declaring thanks to his friends, withdrew his name, and another vote was taken, resulting: For Sherman, 109; Bocock, 29; Barksdale, 19; Miles Taylor, 11; Phelps, 16; Stallworth, 6. A third vote was had for Speaker, 110; Bocock, 31; Barksdale, 32; Bocock, 13; Miles Taylor, 11; Phelps, 16; Stallworth, 6. Necessary to a choice, 113.

On Tuesday 20th, in the Senate, the Homestead Bill was introduced by Senator Simmons, and referred to the Committee. Senator Harlan moved that the rules be made the order of the day for the next session, which was agreed to. Mr. Wilson of Massachusetts introduced a bill to repeal the 12th Amendment, on motion of Senator Seward.——In the House, Mr. Whitney introduced a resolution to pay for his colleague, Mr. Lovejoy, detained at home by illness. Mr. Hickman granted the adoption of the plurality rule. Speeches on the slavery question were made by Messrs. Hickman and Quitman, after which a vote for Speaker was had with this result: For Mr. Sherman, 111; Mr. Bocock, 31; Mr. Barksdale, 31; Mr. Barksdale, 15; Scattering, 41. Another vote showed: For Mr. Sherman, 116; Mr. Barksdale, 31; Mr. Bocock, 31; Mr. Barksdale, 19; Scattering, 33. The third vote was: For Mr. Sherman, 117; Mr. Bocock, 31; Mr. Barksdale, 31; Scattering, 42. Necessary to a choice, 113. The House then adjourned.

On Wednesday, the 21st, Senator Grimes presented some notice of a bill to amend the Court of Claims Act, and of another to prevent the mode of conveyance in Point Coates. The standing committees were announced in executive session. Mr. Hunter introduced a bill for appropriating money to facilitate the acquisition of Cuba, Senator Iverson was followed by Senator Bigler. Senators then went into executive session, and adjourned. ——In the House, the debate on the Speakership was resumed by Mr. Davidson, Cobb, Etheridge, Clark, and Quitman, when the House adjourned without a vote. In the session on Thursday, 22d, the debate was resumed by Mr. Millson, a vote for Speaker was had, giving Mr. Sherman, 109; Mr. Millson, 30; Mr. Clingman, 31; Mr. Etheridge, 7; Mr. Davis, 6; Indiana, 4; Scattering, 7. Necessary to a choice, 113. The House then adjourned.

On Thursday, 22d, in the Senate, Senator Iverson presented a bill to relinquish Oregon for the excesses of the Indian wars; Mr. Davis brought up the Pacific Railroad Bill of last session; Mr. Clay, his bill of last session to abrogate Bills being inserted; Mr. Davis, that relative to the Territory of Arizona. Other measures of minor importance were introduced, and the Senate adjourned. In the House, the debate on the Speakership was resumed, and on Tuesday, and that when it does separate, it shall be to the following Friday, and that this shall be done from day to day, January 3. The resolution, notwithstanding certain modifications, was agreed to by 116 to 71. Others were adopted.——In the House, after a desultory discussion between the South Americans and the Republicans, a vote by yeas and nays was had. The eighteenth ballot stood: For Sherman, 115; for Millson, 79; for Gilmer, 1; for Speaker of Indiana, 4; for Adrian, 5; scattering, 6. Necessary to a choice, 113. The nineteenth effort gave for Sherman, 117; for Millson, 69; Gilmer, 31; scattering, 18. The House then adjourned.

WHY THE REPUBLICANS ARE SILENT.

On Thursday, 22d, in reply to a motion that the adjournment over the holidays, Mr. Grow said:

"Before any practical effort was made to organize the House, the discussion of the whole slavery question was forced upon us by the gentlemen on the other side of slavery. They have continued the discussion from its first day to this, and gentlemen from each side of the House have sat with closed lips under the grossest perversions of their intentions ever uttered by any people who claim to be fair-minded. We sit in the House should gross silly misrepresentations of the Republican party and its principles be tolerated. We are ready to propose to go into organization and leave those men to be heard, because the government will not keep its doors open. We are ready to do the plighted faith of the government shall be observed to all men, but above all to the just creditors, who have performed service under written contracts with it.

* * * * * * *

"My friends have seen fit, in which I think they act wisely, to refrain from discussing questions of this character, and to ask that the House make a serious effort to organize by going to business in a grave manner, and not by voting for a Speaker, or receiving propositions for the purpose of debate. I am ready to vote for any man for Speaker, or for special adjustments to be reported after the House has been organized, and you have a quorum here to do the business of the government, but to day stand on the very threshold of bankruptcy.

* * * * * * *

"Now, I ask the friends with whom I co-operate, and I am sure, gentlemen, in that which is right, I shall not attempt; that as to join in discharging those duties we owe here to our constituents under the law of necessity, as we unite in facilitating the adjustments of the oath we are under in the whole country, and to the same extent as that of men whom the faith of your government is pledged to protect and preserve from violence, and who have faithfully performed their part of the contract. I have no authority for making that proposition, but I believe I can be intimated that when the first day of January comes, if you put your shoulders to the wheel, and organize the business of the contracts exacted to you by law for the transaction of the business of the country, and the appropriations of dollars for you on the contracts, they will receive your most earnest support. I say to you, this, if you choose, let the next session of Congress pass away, stand on record as one under the law of Congress and organize the House. Then take the responsibility upon your own shoulders that we have none of it with you. The country looks to you alone, and why not end the correspondence? I am willing to part; we have all along discharged our duty, and my part in this conflict, has been always to secure and to keep the organization of the House. We will consent to no adjustment except as before the House is organized, and the assessment of members, while the business of the country is dragging, and the most important duties and performances of the public service are left unperformed for."

GROW ON THE HELPER BOOK.

"Now, if gentlemen are satisfied with attempting breadcast through the land this pamphlet, which they say is so destructive to their peace and happiness, and they are satisfied to give a circulation to that pamphlet which they say is so destructive to the peace and happiness, than you have pending before this House the report of the select committee of New York would thank you, and did indeed thank you, for the circulation of that report. I have more than a year to get up a circulation for that pamphlet, and they failed to do it. Yet, gentlemen, they failed to do, have attempted and circulated it throughout the length and breadth of the land; and if it be so destructive as you say it is, and if it be so extended to disturb your peace of mind—as, almost to the destruction of your peculiar institutions and so destructive in the region of the Union—then I tell you emphatically that we yourselves are responsible for it, nor for all this has no effect. We have not circulated it to any considerable extent. We have not extended its circulation to the country to be disturbed, in this great and glorious Union to be convulsed; for the purpose of a war, if we have it not in our power to prevent it, as you say it is, as I suppose it was. It can not be, if it is so destructive and treasonable a book and twelve pages of printed matter can disturb the tranquility."

NEW TERRITORY WITH JESUITS.

The United States ship Savannah arrived at New Orleans last week from Vera Cruz, with Minister McLane and family, and the Hon. Benito Juarez, President of Mexico, which was ratified on the 14th inst. This treaty guarantees to the United States the right of transit over the Tehuantepec route, the Gulf of Mexico, the free transit of merchandise, free and without duties, and the right to protect the transit routes by force. The United States pays to Mexico for the grant four million dollars, in compensation for the release of duties.

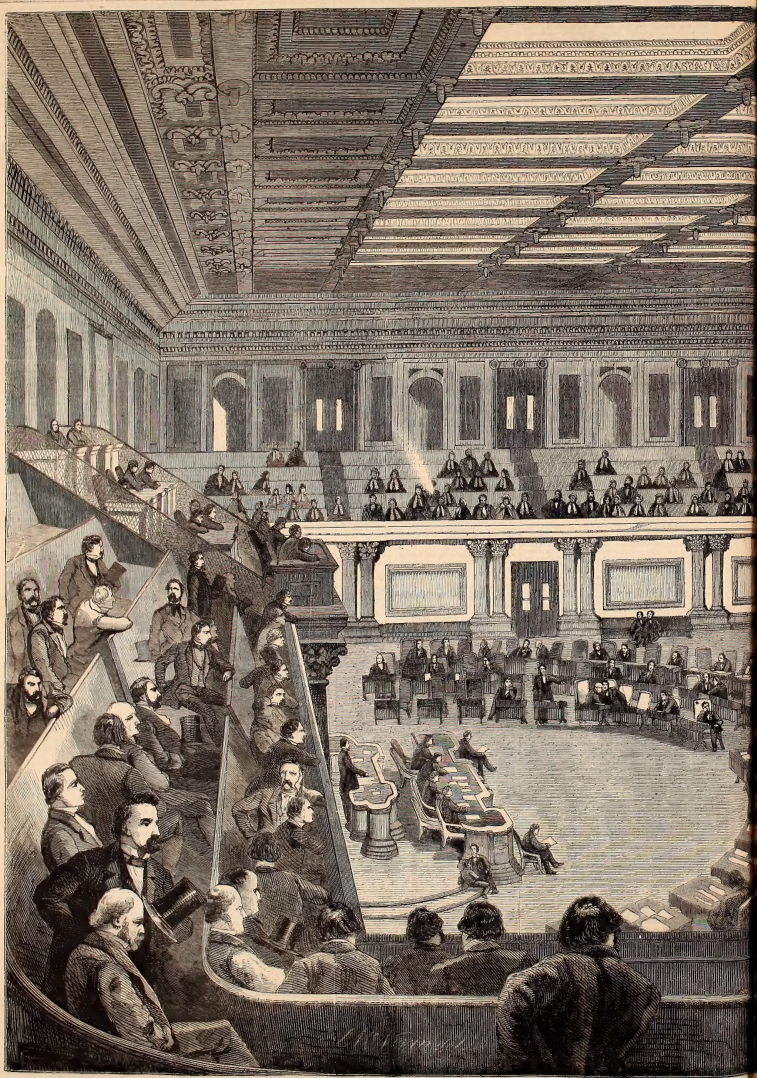
THE CONGRESS TODAY AT BROWNSVILLE.

Our Rome Correspondent, under date December 21, says: "The military are daily having a fete for the military, and the ecclesiastics are daily having a fete for the latter. The military government will cease on the 1st of January, when the civil power will resume its part. The restoration of the civil government and civil rights will be a great boon to the people, especially to the Liberals.

President Buchanan has addressed a note to Andrew Hunter, asking whether Slemons will be tried in the United States Court, or in the State Courts, and what reasonable is give my definite answer, on account of the state of my health, which is very much impaired.

UNION MEETING AT NEW YORK.

The Union meeting at the Academy of Music on Monday night was an immense demonstration of the conservative sentiment of the country. The Hall was filled to overflowing, and the streets in the vicinity were crowded. Resolutions pledging complete Union, but in the subjoining of the Constitution and the enforcement of the laws in all its manner, the rear of artillery, brilliant fire-works and bonfires in the streets. Speeches were made by distinguished men to the effect. Speeches were made by Charles O'Conor, Judge Edmonds, Mr. Ketchum, Mr. Brady, Mr. Cutting, Mr. Bryant, Mr. Cozzens, Mr. Ogden Hoffman



THE UNITED STATES SENATE IN SESS

THEIR NEW CHAMBER.—[See preceding Page.]

LITTLE FRECKLES.

I WAS a most unattractive child, as memory now recalls my little form. Short and fat, with waddling motion, freckled skin, hair red and frizzly, round, bloated cheeks, pug nose, and half-shut eyes. Nature had not been kind to me, nor was I permitted to live unconscious of the fact.

My brothers—gay, thoughtless lads—knew not the injury they were inflicting when they made my personal defects the subject of derision; and those who should have taught them kindly consideration for their little homely sister gave the matter but indolent attention. I was generally known amongst them by the name of "Little Freckles." Had my mind been differently constituted, a lack of ideality would have caused me no concern; but with keen sensibility and much self-esteem my spirit winced under the lightest shaft of ridicule, and in my impotence to redress myself, my heart beat for vengeance. My pride was wounded to the most sensitive point. I knew not whether originally there was any good in my nature—whether I ever possessed any gentle impulses. If I did, they never appeared; they had no room to develop: for as far as my memory can run back, my mind was engrossed between painful rovings over my ill-favored appearance and implacable anger against those by whom my self-love was perpetually wounded.

My sister was a pretty child, with slender form and soft brown hair and eyes. She had "no freckles;" nor of her beauty—that I admired—but of her happiness in possessing the admiration of my parents, from the first, I thought my ugliness declared me. This feeling made me shy and moody; and shrinking from the light of love which I imagined my presence a nuisance, I added to my other ill graces the appearance of sullenness and guile. I loved—but I believed no one loved me. I regarded all as friends of beauty, and consequent enemies of me; and I became misanthropic—misanthropist.

I had reached my tenth year; the bright summer-time had come, and all was gay enjoyment around our rural home, when my mother's sister, with her husband, another of my uncles, and a cousin, paid us a visit. My aunt had no family, though married many years; and it was said she had shed a share of pride that my parents introduced their seven fine children—one all but one, and that one my sister—to her childless home. I was shade, feeling that I had been brought in but to swell the number.

"Well, Ellen," said my father, in his hearty, unique way, "what do you think of the group? Don't you want one of both?"

"Oh yes," replied my aunt, smiling pleasantly, "if you and Fanny can spare us; and it would only have a little girl called after me. Which is she?"

"That's you, Little Freckles," cried brother Bob.

"Here," said my father, drawing me forward; "this is your namesake; but I can not say she very much resembles you."

My quick ear caught a suppressed giggle from the junior circle, which, in addition to my own self-depreciating remark, brought the hot blood to my cheek and a scowl to my brow; but the next moment sensation suddenly stole over me, for my aunt had encircled me with her gentle arm, while with the soft hand of the other she gently put the matted curls from my forehead, and looking kindly in my face, observed—

"Resemble me? Well, she may when she grows up. I can recollect having once been a fat, rosy child, with curls, too. But what is your name, dear?" And bending down, she pressed her warm lips to mine. "Do you think could pa and ma spare you to me?"

"Spare me? Oh yes!" I eagerly exclaimed. "They don't want me at all!" My tone, overcome with the first happy emotions of my life, I dropped my face on her lap and burst into tears.

My mother made no difficulty in giving me up, though she seemed hurt at my willingness to leave her, and painfully recounted upon the many little trials of children, who could turn their backs upon the best of parents in the pursuit of their own ends where. A richer home! I knew nothing about my aunt's wealth. It was the tender embrace, the gentle voice, that drew like loud music to me.

In Washington city, which now became my residence, my person made no more impression upon me than it had done in my Maryland home; but the kind guardianship of my new friends saved me from open rudeness, while they cultivated in me a hope which started no energies, excited my spirit, and made life seem desirable.

The great aim set before me was self-improvement, mentally and bodily. In this my aunt took the tenderest interest. She was not content to bestow upon her attention, she gave herself to my cause, and I gratefully and meekly accepted the sacrifice; her, the scheme gave every promise of success.

Unlike industry, unassuming care gradually produced the desired effect. My mental acquirements began to develop, my outward appearance to improve. I could contemplate myself, not as an increased exertion; no trouble, no difficulty stayed my progress; no lobest of conning art was sealed.

Six years of earnest endeavor and my undeviating project was achieved: the clumsy, stupid child had given place to the graceful and well-polished girl, of whom society would be proud. Not content that I was the same in every house, differing only by improvement. The figure was still short and round, but so exquisitely rounded, so perfectly proportioned in every outline, and the movements, withal, so buoyant, so full of graceful animation, that the admiring eye forgot the claims of slender airiness; the rough, red mop was now a profusion of auburn ringlets, whose silky clusters shaded my face and clustered on my neck; the skin, once lumpy and freckled, was now bleached to ivory whiteness, and smooth and soft as satin; while the darker brow, enriched by intellect, the blue eyes sparkling with mirth, the small mouth, indicating affection and refinement, were well accompanied by full, rosy cheeks, a dimpled chin, and a nose whose slight tendency to a saucy turn just saved the countenance from a haughty expression. Now without the assistance of vanity or coquetry, these personal charms would have been comparatively harmless; but trained in all the arts of coquetry, well versed in the subtle articles of fascination, while skilled in the most showy accomplishments of my sex, I went forth into the world, dazzling with me, well concealed in my bosom, the sin passion, rooted and nourished in my triumphant self-adoration.

And now none saw in my smiling face, my light step, or my varied powers of vows, and the sweet confidence of mutual attachment soothe the pangs of separation, but the secret was interrupted by a servant; a note was put into my hand, and I was again alone. I knew the writing, raised the ensealed paper to my lips, and gently cut the envelope. But what were the words which met my view—which seemed to blind me for the moment, and then call paralyzed my whole being? The note was brief but explicit; the sentences were few but weighty; and even I was an air of cold deliberation. It was instructed by no hasty impulse, no sudden determination, but without the decision of well-arranged plot carefully executed. It was headed, Four-pennies cough, and, addressing me by name, proceeded, in the most formal style, to relate, to announce the writer's projected departure. In the next paragraph he informed me that he had heard of me before he had had the pleasure of seeing me; had understood me from the beginning of our acquaintance, and having noticed his tenure against my fascinations, all my coquettish arts had fallen harmlessly around him. He was now leaving me with heart unhurt, feelings untouched, hopes unclouded; and he would be glad to learn that I had been equally triumphant. I sighed that my flirtation should be cause of regret to neither. He concluded by informing me that his engagement with my uncle would prevent his expected to be united in marriage to a beautiful daughter of the South, and engage its services as my domestic servant, with signature in full.

I had been to town two hours that I sat without moving, the note open in my rigid grasp, my eyes glaring on vacancy, while the sensations I underwent were nearly bordering on madness.

Suddenly I started; some street noise aroused me. I sprang to my feet; a sensation the most terrible ever man can crush me. Pride shouted to my mental ear—my blighted heart and shattered hopes must be concealed within my own bosom; the vile wrong must be unknown to all; I must arise alone to, and be avenged. A voyage to Jamaica for me—the property of Mr. Lefevre, and the sum of my life rushed back with headstrong fury. All beautiful visions, all whole luminous rays to pursue, with unrelenting sin, the man who had sported with my love, trampled on my best feelings, and made me the victim of one of my remaining existence.

It was a powerful struggle which I now had to maintain to hide my sufferings from observation, and naught but my own proud, indomitable will could have enabled me to succeed. But success I did; and none who saw my flashing eye and heard my stern voice, during the gayety of the ensuing summer, had the faintest suspicion that my meat was ashes, my drink urine, and my rest the wretchedness of delirium.

Mr. Lefevre's marriage, an account of which appeared in the papers, created no little excitement and surprise. "Miss Dalton has dismissed him," said those who knew me, "and he has run home and married some other flame." My aunt's family visit did disappointed, and said that she had hoped I had been a welcome guest at least. I laughed and kissed her, promised to take a "serious notion" some time—and so the matter ended.

Mr. Lefevre went to Europe on his wedding tour, not returning until it was time to take his seat in the next session of Congress, when the usual sands of miles from home, enjoying that bliss which I was never to know, the measure of his happiness alone could accurately be under my terrible agony; were put into my turning hands.

My countenance of mind and body were strong: yet the fearful strain upon my nervous system, caused by the concealing of intense sufferings beneath a gay demeanor, could not be continued without injury arising; and despite my resolution to bear up, I soon perceived my equanimity waver, my physical vigor abate.

My aunt questioned me in vain; but I laughed at her fears. "The season was good, I said; I was only suffering from ennui.

The crowd was great, in amaze. "I thought you enjoyed life, Celia."

"So I do!" I exclaimed, "but I love variety. I've been but a few annual round of pleasures for the last ten years—city amusements in winter, fashionable watering-places in summer; and now, as the round has been, I am satiated with it; it has become monotonous; I want a change."

"And what is the change you long for?"

"I should like to go South," I promptly replied. The crowd shouted. "Orange-groves and myrtle bowers, smiling skies and balmy breezes, with all the charming things we read of in romance, would be a most delightful change to me in my dear aunt—would they not?"

My aunt could see in this only a child, ridiculed my taste for romance; but she concluded by fondly kissing me, saying she would speak to uncle about it, and if possible the matter was good as settled.

And so in the bright month of September we steamed through the beautiful Ohio, down the lovely Mississippi, and, without halting in New Orleans—whose hot and dusty thoroughfares were empty and silent—we spent on in search of those inviting scenes which antare, assisted by art, had spread along the shores of Lake Pontchartrain.

The remainder I must write rapidly, for the gnawing of remorse upon my passing heart while memory dwells upon this portion of my life causes excruciating pain.

Frederic Lefevre was entirely dependent on a rich bachelor uncle, to whose estates he was sole heir. He left an orphan in childhood, he had been adopted by the wealthy relative, and brought up in ease and idleness, with no more education than enough to fit him for a politician and a gentleman of fortune; and, unacquainted with professional knowledge, unused to enterprise or industrial pursuits, the love of his uncle's favor, and the expectations accruing therefrom, would completely ruin him. This it was not my aim to effect; hence my desire to travel South, to find him whose acquaintance I most desired to make—Frederic Lefevre.

Without entering into details, it is enough to say I found the old man, taught him to love me, and—to the astonishment of all who knew him—never has to this day been able to account for my choice—I married him.

My scheme had prospered, and the punishment of him who had wronged me had commenced. Fifth cousins and third I dropped from the husband's sure hints which shook the old man's confidence in his adopted heir, and I pursued my advantage with unceasing skill, but almost even sufferings in certain dupe to suspect that I had any personal interest in the matter. Sometimes my better angel would stir up tender memories within me, and my passionate heart would years toward the object of its contemplated ruin; but, determined that no kindly feeling should gain sway, I would immediately recur forth that fatal letter of Frederic's, which I kept in a convenient place for such occasions. The reading of these cold, insulting lines always produced a recurrence of the terrible sensations which I had experienced at their first perusal, and with the stinging feelings resting in my soul I would fly to my husband's arms, and, employing those pretty arts which no one could resist, work out my purpose.

It was done! The pampered son of fortune was stripped of his wealth, from prospects, of social supplies, and stood among his proud compers a pauper!

It was in vain he strove to reverse his doom by writing letter after letter of earnest and piteous pleading to his uncle. I watched for every the eloquent distress, but the hand to which the letters were addressed never received them.

Meanwhile I was the apparently fond guest of the gay; and my husband, flattered and delighted with my well-simulated love, was the subject of mess. In New Orleans, where he had an elegant mansion prepared for me, we spent the winter months; and when the return of the fourth of summer seemed the Crescent City to bore me away to his old Alabama home, amidst the flourishing plantations of his wide domain.

I fear the remaining lines will be scarcely legible, for the tears will flow so fast and blind me by my pen, and frightened memory can not find coherent language in which to depict the last dark scene.

I was sitting on the piazza alone; my husband came and sat down by my side. He sighed—laughed. dwelt upon his former love for him, regretted the estrangement that had come between them, expressed a wish for a reconciliation, and, finally, asked me if I would not receive the young man and his wife and family of members of my family. I inquired what had suggested this amiable train of thought, and learned that my ci-devant lover was on the wing for home, and had had an interview with his uncle. Then my brain took fire, my blood boiled, and with a wild, piercing scream at the mystery of my scathed heart burst forth. I know not what I said in those insane moments. I only knew my astonished husband bore all—all I poured on his adopted son—and started, with frenzy in my heart, and a sword in tauntingly hand.

"Now, Sir, bring the gentleman here, if you dare!"

As I sunk back in my seat the old man moved away, but blind excitement prevented my observing the terrible effect of my disclosures upon him. Alas! his more than life had been wrapped up in the fond delusion of his young wife's love!

I am not aware how long had I sat, but the fierce tumult of my soul was wasting when—was I dreaming? Did my eyes, my very eyes, play tricks, seated familiarly, his gaze fixed upon my countenance, was he shorn of all the world I should have there now.

What was he saying? Something about friendship, and kindness, and regrets—and what I heard him not—my senses were bewildered, my heart was aglow, emotions not but undefined filled my breast

"I was to blame in every way," he said; "I was selfish rather than a vigor springs upon his prey the dead sea dove—and, forgetful of my duty to my husband's genius and, struck the young man's head, and Frederic Lefevre was a corpse at my feet.

Of what followed I had but a confused perception; there was running, and a crowd of servants gathered about the murdered and murderer; and, I know, they did it, for he was well-beloved by them all. One fled for a physician, who soon came; the dead was not dead, but his skill, alas! availed no medicine could cure.

The record is painful; while folk came in troops, I only desired to sit on the floor and gaze on that pale, sleeping face; but some ladies, who thought I knew them, led me away from it.

Then there was an inquest and a funeral, a delayed widow and an injured child; and while the owner of the proud estate was a raving prisoner, held down in the house where he had reigned.

And Little Freckles—she lived still. The madness and the murder were my doing; though no one knew it, and conventional sorrow sympathy and tenderness were lavished unsparingly upon me. My aunt and uncle hastened to me in their affection and brought me to go home with them; but what have I to do with peace, or kindness, or any earthly good? here, by the side of him whose reason I destroyed, on the spot where he fell whose blood is on my hands, let me, in tears and penitence and prayer, finish out my bitter cup. I have not seen thirty years; yet I am bowed, and withering, and gray, and have not lived one half my days; and if mercy is not extended to me—

THE WOMAN IN WHITE.

By WILKIE COLLINS.

AUTHOR OF "THE DEAD SECRET," "AFTER DARK," ETC. ETC.

[Printed from advance proof-sheets purchased from the author exclusively for "Harper's Weekly."]

HARTRIGHT'S NARRATIVE—Continued.

XII.

THE exposed situation of the church-yard had obliged me to be cautious in choosing the position that I was to occupy.

The main entrance to the church was on the side next to the burial-ground; and the door was screened by a porch walled in on either side. After some little hesitation, caused by a natural reluctance to reveal myself, independently also of the concealment was to the object in view, I had resolved on entering the porch. A loophole window has been pierced in each of its side walls. Through one of these windows I could see Mrs. Fairlie's grave. The other looked toward the stone quarry in which the sexton's cottage was built. Before me, fronting the porch entrance, was a patch of bare burial-ground, a line of low stone wall, and a strip of lonely brown hill, with the same cloud-shadow hurrying over it before the strong, steady wind. No living creature was visible or audible—and but few by me; no dog barked from the sexton's cottage. The pauses in the dull beating of the surf were filled up by the dreary rustling of the desert trees near the grave, and the cold, faint bubble of the brook over its stony bed. A dreary scene and a dreary hour. My spirits sank fast as I counted on the minutes of the evening in my hiding-place under the church porch.

It was not twilight yet—the light of the setting sun still lingered in the heavens, and little more than the first half hour of my solitary watch had elapsed—when I heard footsteps and a voice. The footsteps were approaching from the other side of the church; and the voice was a woman's.

"Don't you fret, my dear, about the letter," said the voice. "I'll save it to the last quite safe, and the lad he took it from can wait a week. He went his way and I went mine; and not a living soul followed me, afterward—that I'll warrant."

These words strung up my attention to a pitch of expectation that was almost painful. There was a pause of silence, but the footsteps still advanced. In another moment two persons, both women, passed within my range of view from the porch window. They were walking straight toward the grave; and therefore they and their backs turned toward me.

One of the women was dressed in a bonnet and shawl. The other wore a long traveling cloak of a dark blue color, with the hood drawn over her head. At either of the two figures were visible below the cloak. My heart beat fast as I noted the color—it was white.

After advancing about half-way between the church and the grave they stopped; and the woman in the cloak turned her head toward her companion. But her side face, which a bonnet might now have allowed me to see, was hidden by the heavy projecting edge of the hood.

"Mind you keep that comfortable warm cloak on," said the same voice which I had already heard—the voice of the woman in the shawl. "Mrs. Fairlie is right about your looking too particular, yesterday, all in white. I'll walk about a little, while you're here; church-yards bring not at all in my way, whatever they may be in yours. Finish what you want to do before I come back; and let us be sure and get home again before night."

With those words she turned about, and, retracing her steps, advanced with her face toward me. It was the face of an elderly woman, brown, rugged, and healthy, with nothing dishonest or suspicious in the look of it. Close to the church she stopped to pail her shawl closer round her.

"Queer," she said to herself, "always queer, with her whims and her ways, ever since I can remember her. Harmless, though—as harmless, poor soul, as a little child."

She sighed; looked about the burial-ground nervously; shook her head as if the dreary prospect by no means pleased her; and disappeared round the corner of the church.

I doubted for a moment whether I ought to follow and speak to her, or not. My intense anxiety to find myself face to face with her companion helped me to decide in the negative. I could insure seeing the woman in the shawl by waiting near the church-yard until she came back—although it seemed more than doubtful whether she could give me the information for which I was in search. The person who had delivered the letter was of little consequence. The person who had written it was the one centre of interest, and the one source of information; and that person I was fully convinced was before me in the church-yard.

While these ideas were passing through my mind, I saw the woman in the cloak approach close to the grave, and stand looking at it for a little while. She then glanced all round her, and, taking a white linen cloth or handkerchief from under her cloak, turned aside toward the brook. The little stream ran into the church-yard under a tiny arch-way in the bottom of the wall, and ran out again, after a winding course of a few dozen yards, under a similar opening. She dipped the cloth in the water, and returned to the grave. I saw her kiss the white cross; then kneel down before the inscription, and spread her cloth to the cleansing of it.

After considering how I could show myself with the least possible chance of frightening her, I resolved to cross the wall before me, to skirt round it outside, and to enter the church-yard again by the side near the grave, in order that she might see me as I approached. She was so absorbed over her employment that she did not hear me coming until I had stepped over the stile. Then she looked up, started to her feet with a cry, and stood facing me in speechless and motionless terror.

"Don't be frightened," I said. "Surely you remember me?"

I stopped while I spoke—then advanced a few steps gently—then stopped again—and so approached by little and little, till I was close to her. If there had been any doubt still left in my mind it must have been now set at rest. There, speaking affrightedly for itself—there was the same dark complexion as that of Mrs. Fairlie's grave, which had first looked into mine on the high road by night.

"Don't you remember?" I said. "We met very late, and I helped you to find the way to London. Surely you remember that night?"

Her features relaxed, and she drew a heavy breath of relief. I saw the new life of recognition stirring slowly across the deathlike stillness in which fear had set on her face.

"Don't speak to me, for mercy, so me just yet," went on. "Take time to recover yourself—take time to feel quite certain that I am a friend."

"I know you are very kind to me," she murmured. "As kind now as you were then."

She stopped, and looked about on my side. I was not granting time for composure to her only, I was gaining time also for myself. Slowly, I was gaining time also for myself. Slowly, with a strange, wild, strained light, that woman and I were met together again; a grave between us, the dead and the innocent silent and closing us round on every side. The time, the place, the circumstances under which we now stood inch of the progress I might yet make now depended. I tried hard, as I felt this, to possess myself of all my resources; I did succeed in the turn the few moments for reflection to the best account.

"Are you calmer, now?" I said, as soon as I thought it time to speak again. "Can you talk to me without feeling frightened, and without forgetting that I am a friend?"

"How did you come here?" she asked, without noticing what I had just said to her.

"Don't you remember my telling you, when we last met, that I was going to Cumberland? I have been in Cumberland ever since; I have been staying all the time at Limmeridge House."

"At Limmeridge House!" Her pale face brightened as she repeated the words; her wandering eyes fixed on me with a sudden interest. "Ah, how happy you must have been!" she said, looking at me eagerly, without a shadow of the former distrust left in her expression.

I took advantage of her newly-aroused confidence in me, to observe her face, with an attention and a curiosity which I had hitherto restrained myself from showing, for caution's sake. I looked at her, with my mind full of that other lovely face which had so ominously recalled her to my memory on the previous moonlight. I had seen Anne Catherick's likeness in Miss Fairlie. I now saw Miss Fairlie's likeness in Anne Catherick—saw it all the more clearly because the points of dissimilarity between the two were presented to me as well as the points of resemblance. In the general outline of the countenance and general proportion of the features; in the color of the hair and in the little nervous uncertainty about the lips; in the height and size of the figure, and the carriage of the head and body, the likeness appeared even more startling than I had ever felt it to be yet. But there-the resemblance ended, and the dissimilarity, in details, began. The delicate beauty of Miss Fairlie's complexion, the transparent clearness of her eyes, the smooth purity of her skin, the tender bloom of color on her lips, were all missing from the worn, weary face that was now turned toward mine. Although I hated myself even for thinking such a thing, still, while I looked at the woman before me, the idea would force itself into my mind that one and change, in the future, was all that was wanting to make the likeness complete, which I now saw to be so imperfect in detail. If ever sorrow and suffering set their profaning marks on the youth and beauty of Miss Fairlie's face, then, and then only, Anne Catherick and she would be the two sisters—if chance-resemblance, the living reflections of one another.

I shuddered at the thought. There was something horrible in the blind, unreasoning distrust of the future which the mere passage of it through my mind seemed to imply. It was a welcome interruption to be roused by feeling Anne Catherick's hand laid on my shoulder. The touch was as startling and as sudden as that other touch, which had petrified me from head to foot on the night when we first met.

"You are looking at me; and you are thinking of something," she said, with her strange, breathless rapidity of utterance. "What is it?"

"Nothing extraordinary," I answered. "I was only wondering how you came here."

"I came with a friend who is very good to me. I have only been here two days."

"And you found your way to this place yesterday?"

"How do you know that?"

"I only guessed it."

She turned from me, and knelt down before the inscription once more.

"Where should I go, if not here?" she said. "The friend who was better than a mother to me, is the only friend I have to visit at Limmeridge. Oh, it makes my heart ache to see a stain on her name! It ought to be kept white as snow, for her sake. I was tempted to begin cleaning it yesterday; and I can't help coming back to go on with it to-day. Is there any thing wrong in that? I hope not. Surely nothing can be wrong that I do for Mrs. Fairlie's sake?"

The old grateful sense of her beneficence's kindness was evidently the ruling idea still in the poor creature's mind—the narrow mind which had not too plainly opened to no other lasting impression since that first impression of her younger and happier days. I saw that my best chance of winning her confidence by is encouraging her to proceed with the artless employment which she had come to the burial-ground to pursue. She resumed it at once, on my telling her she might do so; touching the hard marble as tenderly as if it had been a sentient thing, and whispering the words of the inscription to herself, over and over again, as if the lost days of her girlhood had returned, and she was patiently learning her lesson once more at Mrs. Fairlie's knees.

"Should you wonder very much," I said, preparing the way as cautiously as I could for the questions that were to come, "if I owned that it is a satisfaction to me, as well as a surprise, to see you here? I felt very uneasy about you after you left me in the cab."

She looked up quickly and suspiciously.

"Uneasy," she repeated. "Why?"

"A strange thing happened, after we parted, that night. Two men overtook me in a chaise. They did not see where I was standing; but they stopped near me, and spoke to a policeman, on the other side of the way."

She instantly suspended her employment. The hand holding the damp cloth with which she had been cleaning the inscription dropped to her side: the other hand grasped the marble cross at the head of the grave. Her face turned toward me slowly, with the blank look of terror set rigidly on it once more. I went on at all hazards; it was too late now to draw back.

"THE HAND HOLDING THE DAMP CLOTH WITH WHICH SHE HAD BEEN CLEANING THE INSCRIPTION DROPPED TO HER SIDE; THE OTHER HAND GRASPED THE MARBLE CROSS," ETC.

"The two men spoke to the policeman," I said, "and asked him if he had seen you. He had not seen you; and then one of the men spoke again, and said you had escaped from his Asylum."

She sprang to her feet, as if my last words had set fire mortine on her train.

"Stop! and hear the end," I cried. "Stop! and you shall know how I behaved to you. A word from me would have told the men which way you had gone—and I never spoke that word. I helped your escape—I made a safe and certain. Think, try to think. Try to understand what I tell you.

My manner seemed to influence her more than my words. She made an effort to grasp the new idea. Her hands shifted the damp cloth hesitatingly from one to the other, exactly as they had shifted the little traveling bag on the night when I first saw her. Slowly, the purpose of my words seemed to force its way through the confusion and agitation of her mind. Slowly, her features relaxed, and her eyes looked at me with their expression gaining in curiosity what it was fast losing in fear.

"You don't think I ought to be back in the Asylum, do you?" she said.

"Certainly not. I am glad you escaped from it; I am glad I helped you."

"Yes, yes; you did help me, indeed; you helped me at the hard part," she went on, a little to herself. "It was easy to escape, or I should not have got away. They never suspected me as they suspected the others. I was so quiet, and so obedient, and so easily frightened. The finding London was the hard part; and there you helped me. Did I thank you at the time?

I thank you now, very kindly."

"Were the Asylum for from where you met me? Come! show that you believe me to be your friend, and tell me where it was."

She mentioned the place—a private Asylum, as its situation informed me; a private Asylum not very far from the spot where I had seen her —and then, with evident suspicion of the use to which I might put her answer, anxiously repeated her former inquiry: "You don't think I ought to be taken back, do you?"

"Once again, I am glad you escaped; I am glad you prospered well, after you left me," I answered. "You said you had a friend in London to go to. Did you find the friend?"

"Yes. It was very late; but there was a girl at a needle-work in the house, and she helped me to some Mrs. Clements. Mrs. Clements is my friend. A good, kind woman, but not like Mrs. Fairlie. Ah, no, nobody is like Mrs. Fairlie."

"Is Mrs. Clements an old friend of yours? Have you known her a long time?"

"Yes; she was a neighbor of ours once, at home, in Hampshire; and liked me, and took care of me when I was a little girl. Years ago, when she went away from us, she wrote down in my prayer-book for me, where she was going to live in London, and she said, 'If you are ever in trouble, Anne, come to me. I have no husband alive to say me nay, and no children to look after; and I will take care of you.' Kind words, were they not? I suppose I remember them because they were kind. It's little enough I remember besides—little enough, little enough!"

"Had you no father or mother to take care of you?"

"Father? I never saw him: I never heard mother speak of him. Father? Ah, dear! he is dead, I suppose."

"And your mother?"

"I don't get on well with her. We are a trouble and a fear to each other."

A trouble and a fear to each other! As those words the suspicion crushed my mind for the first time that her mother might be the person who had placed her under restraint.

"Don't ask me about mother," she went on. "I'd rather talk of Mrs. Clements. Mrs. Clements is like you, and doesn't think that I ought to be back in the Asylum; and she is as glad as you are that I escaped from it. She cried over my wedding-ring, and said it must be kept away from every body."

Her "misfortune"! In what sense was she using that word? In a sense which might explain her motive in writing the anonymous letter? In a sense which might show it to be the too common and too customary motive that has led many a man to interpose unnecessary hindrances to the marriage of the man who has ruined her? I resolved to attempt the clearing up of this doubt, before more words passed between us on either side.

"What misfortune?" I asked.

"The misfortune of my being shut up," she answered, with every appearance of feeling surprised at my question. "What other misfortune could there be?"

I persisted in pursuit, as delicately and forbearingly as possible. It was of very great importance that I should be absolutely sure on every step in the investigation that I was going on grounded in advance.

"There is another misfortune," I said, "to which a woman may be liable, and by which she may suffer life-long sorrow and shame."

"What is it?" she asked, eagerly.

"The misfortune of believing too innocently in her own virtue, and in the faith and honor of the man she loves," I answered.

She looked up at me, with the artless bewilderment of a child. Not the slightest confusion or change of color; not the faintest trace of any secret consciousness of shame struggled to the surface, appeared in her face—that face which betrayed every other emotion with such transparent clearness. No action that crying guilt could have assumed me, as her look and manner now assumed me, when the motive which I had assigned for her writing the letter and sending it to Miss Fairlie was plainly and distinctly the wrong one. That doubt, at any rate, was now set at rest; but the very removal of it opened a new prospect of uncertainty. Had the letter, I knew from positive testimony, pointed at Sir Percival Glyde, though it did not name him. She must have had some strong motive for consenting in some deep sense of injury, for secretly denouncing him to Miss Fairlie, as a man whom as she had employed—and that motive was unquestionably not to be traced to the ties of her innocence and her trust. Whatever wrong he might have inflicted on her was not of that nature. Of what nature could it be?

"I don't understand you," she said, after evidently trying hard, and trying in vain, to discover the meaning of the words that I had said to her.

"Never mind," I answered. "Let us go on with what we were talking about. Tell me how long you staid with Mrs. Clements in London, and how you came here."

"How long?" she repeated. "I staid with Mrs. Clements till we both came to the Asylum two days ago."

"You are living in the village, then?" I said. "It is strange I should not have heard of you, though you have only been there two days."

"No, not in the village. Two miles away at a farm. Do you know the farm? They call it Todd's Corner."

I remembered the place perfectly; we had often passed by it in our drives. It was one of the oldest farms in the neighborhood, situated in a solitary, sheltered spot, inland, at the junction of two hills.

"They are relations of Mrs. Clements at Todd's Corner," she went on, "and they had often asked her to go and see them. She said she would go, and take me with her, for the quiet and the fresh air. It was very kind, was it not? I should have gone any where to be quiet, and safe, and out of the way. But when I heard that Todd's Corner was near Limmeridge—oh! I was so happy I would have walked all the way there to get there, and see the schools and the village and Limmeridge House again. They are very good people at Todd's Corner. I hope I shall stay there a long time. There is only one thing I don't like about them, and don't like about Mrs. Clements—"

"What is it?"

"They will tease me about dressing all in white—they say it looks so particular. How do they know? Mrs. Fairlie knew best. Mrs. Fairlie would never have made me wear such ugly blue cloak. Ah! she was fond of white in her lifetime; and here is white stone about her grave—and I am making it white for her now. She often wore white herself; and she always dressed her little daughter in white. Is Miss Fairlie well and happy? Does she wear white now, as she used when she was a girl?"

Her voice sank when she put the questions about Miss Fairlie; and she turned her head farther and farther away from me, as though I detected, in the alteration in her manner, an uneasy consciousness of the risk she had run in sending the anonymous letter; and I instantly determined so to frame my answer as to surprise her into owning it.

"Miss Fairlie is not very well or very happy this morning," I said.

She murmured a few words; but they were spoken so confusedly, and in such a low tone, that I could not even guess at what they meant.

"Did you ask me why Miss Fairlie was neither well nor happy this morning?" I continued.

"No," she said, quickly and eagerly—"oh, no, I never asked that."

"I will tell you without your asking," I went on. "Miss Fairlie has received your letter."

She had been down on her knees for some little time past, carefully removing the last weather-stains left about the inscription, while we were speaking together. The first sentence of the words I had just written made her pause in her occupation, and turn slowly, without rising from her knees, on the grass. The second sentence literally petrified her. The cloth she had been holding dropped from her hands; and she looked at the little colored thread she was naturally in her face left it in an instant.

"How do you know?" she said, faintly. "Who showed it to you?" The blood rushed back into her face, and overwhelmingly, as the sense rushed upon her mind that her own words had betrayed her. She clasped her hands together in despair. "I never wrote it," she gasped, affrightedly; "I know nothing about it!"

"Yes," I said, "you wrote it, and you know it. Her mother and I have seen and read a letter: it was wrong to frighten Miss Fairlie. If you had any thing to say that it was right and necessary for her to hear, you should have gone yourself to Limmeridge House; you should have come to me openly with your errand. Why—"

She crouched down over the flat stone of the grave, till her face was hidden on it; and made no reply.

"Miss Fairlie will be as good and kind to you as her mother was, if you send such a letter," I went on. "Miss Fairlie will keep your secret, and not let you come to any harm. Will you ever have so-too-more kindness? Will you meet her in the garden at Limmeridge House?"

"Oh, if I could, if I could!" she panted out at rest with you?" Her lips murmured the words close on the grave-stone; murmured them in a manner which betrayed that she had not dismissed hope.

"You know how I love you," I said, "for Laura Fairlie's sake. You know how Miss Fairlie I tell me how to save her. To my dwelling and my mother once more, and tell me what to do for the best."

I heard her lips kissing the stone: I saw her hands clasped in passionate joy. The sound and the sight deeply affected me. I stooped down, and took the poor helpless hands tenderly in mine, and raised her from the earth.

It was useless. She snatched her hands from me, and covered her face with them the stone. Seeing the urgent necessity of quieting her at any hazard and by any means, I appealed to the only remaining interest she seemed to feel, in connection with me and with my opinions—the interest which I had roused by her fitness to be mistress of her own actions.

"Come, come," I said, gently. "Try to compose yourself, and make me alter my opinion of you. Don't let me think that the person you put in the Asylum might have had some excuse—"

The next words died away on my lips. The effect of the most ordinary references to the person who had put her in the Asylum, she sprang up in a frenzy of passionate animosity and startling change passed over her. Her face, at all ordinary times so touching to look at, in its memory and sorrow, sweet, and uncertainty, became suddenly darkened by an expression of unmistakable intense hatred and fear, which communicated a wild, unnatural force to every feature. Her eyes dilated in the dim evening light, like the eyes of a wild animal. She caught up the cloth that had fallen at her side, as if it had been a living creature that she could kill, and crushed it in both her hands with such convulsive strength that the fine drops of moisture from the cold dew fell down on the stone beneath her.

"Talk of Count Fosco," she said, whisper-ing through her teeth. "I shall lose myself if you talk of that."

Every struggle of the gentler thoughts which had filled her mind hardly a minute since seemed to be swept from it. I saw, to evident that the impression left by Mrs. Fairlie's kindness was not, as I had supposed, the only strong impression left on her mind. With the grateful remembrance of her school-days at Limmeridge there existed the vindictive remembrance of the wrong inflicted on her by her confinement in the Asylum. Who had done that wrong? I was soon to know the name.

It was hard to give up pursuing the inquiry to that fatal point; but I was forced to abandon all idea of continuing it. Seeing her as I saw her now, it would have been cruel to think of any thing but the necessity and the humanity of restoring her composure.

I said talk of nothing to distress you," I said, soothingly.

"You want something," she answered, sharply and suspiciously, looking back at me like that. Speak to me; tell me what you want."

"I only want you to quiet yourself, and, when you are calmer, to think over what I have said."

"Said!" She paused; twisted the cloth in her hands backward and forward; and whispered to herself, "What is it he said?" She looked again at me, and shook her head impatiently. "Why don't you help me?" she asked, with angry suddenness.

"Yes, yes," I said; "I will help you; and you will soon remember. I asked you to see Miss Fairlie to-morrow, and to tell her the truth about the letter."

"Ah! Miss Fairlie—Fairlie—Fairlie—"

The mere utterance of the loved, familiar name seemed to quiet her. Her face softened and grew like itself again.

"You need have no fear of Miss Fairlie," I continued; "and no fear of getting into trouble through the letter. She knows so much about it already, that she will have no difficulty in telling her all. There can be little necessity for concealment where there is hardly any thing left to conceal. You mention no names in the letter; but Miss Fairlie knows that the person you refer to is Sir Percival Glyde—"

The instant I pronounced that name she started to her feet; and a scream burst from her that rang through the church-yard and made my heart leap in me with the terror of it. The dead silence of the expression which had just left her face, lowered on it once more, with doubled and trebled intensity. The sketch of the name, the reiterated look of hatred and fear that instantly followed, told all. Not even a last doubt now remained. Her mother—the guiltless of imprisoning her in the Asylum. A man had set her up—and that man was Sir Percival Glyde.

The scream had reached other ears than mine. In one side of the distant the door of the sexton's cottage open; on the other, I heard the voice of her companion, the woman in the farm's they woman whom she had spoken of as Mrs. Clements.

"I'm coming! I'm coming!" cried the voice from behind the clump of dwarf trees.

In a moment more Mrs. Clements hurried into view.

"Who are you?" she cried, facing me, resolutely, on the first sight of my face. "How dare you frighten a poor helpless woman like that?"

She was at Anne Catherick's side, and had put one arm around her, before I could answer.

"What is it, my dear?" she said. "What has he done to you?"

"Nothing," the poor creature answered. Nothing. I'm only frightened.

Mrs. Clements turned on me with a fearless indignation that I could not but respect.

"I should be heartily ashamed of myself if I deserved what you have said," I replied. "But I do not deserve it. I have unfortunately startled her without intending it. This is not the first time she has seen me. Ask her yourself, and she will tell you that I am incapable of willfully harming her or any woman."

I spoke distinctly, so that Anne Catherick might hear and understand me: and I saw that the words had the meaning that reached her.

"Yes, yes," she said; "she was good to me once; he frightened me—" She whispered the rest into her friend's ear.

"Strange, indeed!" said Mrs. Clements, with a look of perplexity. "It makes all the difference, though. I'm sorry I spoke so rough to you, Sir; but you must own that appearances were against you as a stranger. It's more my fault than yours, for honoring her whom, and caring for her as much as I do, makes us this. Come, my dear—come home now—"

The strength of the woman looked a little uneasy at the prospect of the walk back, and I offered to go with them until they were both within sight of home. Mrs. Clements thanked me civilly, and declined. She said they were sure to meet some of the farm laborers as soon as they got to the moor.

"Try to forgive me," I said, when Anne Catherick allowed me to turn my arm to go away. Innocent as I had been of any intention to terrify and agitate her, my heart smote me as I looked at her gentle, frightened face.

"I will try," she answered. "But you know too much. I'm afraid you will always frighten me now."

Mrs. Clements glanced at me, and shook her head, pityingly.

"Good-night, Sir," she said. "You couldn't help it, I dare say; but I wish you had not frightened, and not her."

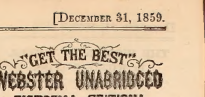
They moved away a few steps. I thought they had left me, and Anne suddenly stopped and separated herself from her friend.

"Wait a little," she said. "I must say good-by."

She returned to the grave, rested both hands tenderly on the marble cross, and kissed it.

"I'm better now," she sighed, looking up at me quietly. "Good-by, Sir."

She joined her companion again, and they left the burial-ground. I saw them stop near the church, and speak to the sexton's wife, who had come from the cottage, and had waited, watching at a distance. Then they went on again up the path that led to the moor. I looked after Anne Catherick as she disappeared till all trace of her had faded in the twilight—looked as anxiously and sorrowfully as if that was the last time I was to see in this weary world of the woman in white.



1500 Pictorial Illustrations.

Webster's Unabridged Dictionary.

New Pictorial Edition.

1500 Pictorial Illustrations.

9,000 to 10,000 NEW WORDS in the Vocabulary.

Table of SYNONYMS by Prof. Goodrich.

TABLE GIVING PRONUNCIATION OF NAMES OF 9000 DIFFERENT PERSONS AND PLACES.

PECULIAR USE OF WORDS AND TERMS IN THE BIBLE, with other new features. Together with all the matter of previous editions. In one volume of 1750 pages, of small size, with 1500 Illustrations, making it a famous to those of book notes, are worth the price of the book.—Ch. Herald.

Price $6 50. Sold by all Booksellers.

CF Also a fine edition of the above in various bindings, on sized paper, with ample margin, making it convenient to those who desire to write notes.

G. & C. MERRIAM, Springfield, Mass.

STILL ANOTHER PROOF.

Paulson's Coal Oil

To Dress your Hair and

REMOVE DANDRUFF.

MESSRS. PAULSON & BRO., PHILADELPHIA, Nov 7, 1859.

Gentlemen: For some time I have been using your COAL OIL as Hair Dressing, and in removing the Dandruff from my head.

I must candidly say that I have never used any article that has given me so speedy removal of Dandruff as COAL OIL, and at the same time stopping a constant irritation of the skin.

As a preparation for Hair Dressing, I have never found any article that would keep my hair in its place for so long a time, and give it such a smooth and brilliant appearance.

As your COAL has been so beneficial to me, you are at liberty to use this letter if it is of any use to you.

Respectfully yours,

CASIMIR H. HUGHES.

The above letter will satisfy all that it is the best preparation made to remove Dandruff and cure the Itch. Sold by all Druggists. Virginia oil bottles, at 50 cents a bottle, and by the manufacturers,

PEALSON & SON, NEW YORK.

Bronchitis.

From Mr. C. H. Gardner, Principal of the Ranger's Academy, Fishkill, N. Y.:—"I have been afflicted with Bronchitis during the past winter, and found no relief until I found BROWN'S BRONCHIAL TROCHES. Obtained, by Congh Lozenges, are for sale throughout the country."

Over Five Thousand Bottles Sold of

PHALON'S SNOW WHITE ORIENTAL CREAM,

FOR WHITENING AND BEAUTIFYING THE COMPLEXION,

And removing Tan, Freckles, and all Roughness of the Skin. As it contains no lead or arsenic it is the preference over Lily Whites, Cosmetics, &c., which are so injurious to the skin.

It is the most perfect article ever manufactured, and is certain to be in the only preparation in the world who can it once will be perfectly satisfied of this. It is put up in small and large bottles, at 50 Cents and One Dollar.

Prepared and originated by

PEALSON & SON, NEW YORK.

COUGHS, COLDS, HOARSENESS and BRONCHITIS, INFLUENZA, CROUPS, or any affection of the THROAT CURED, BY BROWN'S BRONCHIAL TROCHES, or BROWN'S BRONCHIAL SYRUP. Obtained, by Congh Lozenges, are for sale throughout the country.

BROWN'S BRONCHIAL TROCHES,

"A simple and elegant combination for COUGHS, &c."—Boston Medical and Surgical Journal.

"Have proved extremely serviceable for HOARSENESS."—Rev. E. H. CHAPIN, New York.

"I recommend their use to PUBLIC SPEAKERS."—Rev. E. H. GRIFFIN, D.D., Williamstown, Mass.

"Most salutary relief in BRONCHITIS."—Rev. ALONZO POTTER, Bishop of Pennsylvania.

"Beneficial when compelled to speak suffering from COLD."—Rev. S. H. TYNG, Jr., New York.

"Especially in remaining Hoarseness and Irritation of the Throat, so common with SPEAKERS and SINGERS."—Prof. M. STACY JOHNSON, LaGrange, Ga.

Principal of Music, Southern Female College.

"Great benefit when taken before and after preaching, relieving Hoarseness and the most PAINFUL of throat affections, I think they will be of permanent advantage to me."—Rev. DUNCAN A. M., President Athens College, Tenn.

Sold by all Druggists, at 25 cents a box.

PERRY DAVIS'

VEGETABLE PAIN KILLER.

The Great Family Medicine of the Age.

Taken Internally Cures

SUDDEN COLDS, COUGHS, &c.
WEAK STOMACH,
NERVOUS DEBILITY,
NURSING SORE MOUTH, CANKER,
SOUR STOMACH,
DYSPEPSIA OR INDIGESTION,
PAIN AND PAIN IN THE STOMACH,
BOWEL COMPLAINT,
PAINTERS' COLIC, ASIATIC CHOLERA,
DIARRHEA AND DYSENTERY.

Used externally Cures

FELONS, BOILS AND CARBUNCLES,
SEVERE BURNS AND SCALDS,
CUTS, BRUISES AND SPRAINS,
SWELLING OF THE JOINTS, RHEUMATISM AND LUMBAGO,
BROKEN BREASTS,
TERRIFIC FEET AND CHILBLAINS,
TOOTHACHE,
PAIN IN THE FACE,
NEURALGIA AND RHEUMATISM.

The PAIN KILLER is by universal consent allowed to have won for itself a reputation unsurpassed in the history of medical preparations. Its tremendous effect on the entire eradication and extinction of PAIN in all its various forms instituted in the human family, and the unsolicited written and verbal testimony of the masses in its favor, have been, and are in our last days, astonishing.

The ingredients of which the PAIN KILLER being PURELY VEGETABLE, render it a PERFECTLY SAFE and efficacious remedy taken internally, as well as for external applications, when used according to the directions. The slight stain upon linen from its use no external applications, is readily removed by washing with a little alcohol. For sale by all Dealers in Medicines.

The Good Man's Christmas Song.

BY NAPOLEON B. GOULD.

WHEN Winter comes with frost and snows,
Give to the poor your last year's clothes;
Make others warm, and warm your heart
By charity's exalted part.
So may you thrive from year to year,
And Christmas still bring many cheers!

And think not you will lose by this—
Man only lose who do amiss;
And charity, as sages say,
Compensates all it takes away.
Smith Brothers sell nice clothes so cheap
That for your old you m'n'e need reap.

"Twin Temples of Fashion."

ONE PRICE—NO DEVIATION.

The Price is marked on all the Goods in Plain Figures.

SMITH BROTHERS,

The Marble Stores,

122, 138, and 140 Fulton Street,

Between Broadway and William St.,

THOMAS SMITH, Jr.,
ROBERT L. SMITH, } NEW YORK.
J. SMITH RICE.

DR. J. B. MARCHISI'S
Celebrated Uterine Catholicon,
For the Initial and Cure of Suffering Females.

Climate and the normal habits of female life unproduce a variety of diseases which this Catholicon will counteract and cure. It can be relied upon in any form of Falsified, Suppressed, or Irregular Menstruation, Fluor Albus, Sterility, Pain in the Back and Loins, Womb, Falsenes, Lassitude, &c. Where every thing else has failed, this article is never taken without benefit. No suffering female should trifle with her health, as prompt, with full symptoms, treatment, letters, &c., sent gratis by mail, or delivered by any agent. It is mild in its operation, or sent by express. Be cautious of an imitation, somewhat similar in name, with my certificates altered, &c. Address BARNES & PARK, No. 13 PARK ROW, P. O. Box 1,224, Cincinnati, Ohio. Sold by METCALF & POTTER, Boston; or CALLENDER & CO., Philad.

J. B. MARCHISI, M.D., Cincinnati, O.

Great Reduction in Prices at Genin's Bazar.
Prices Reduced.

IN LADIES AND EMBROIDERIES — IN BOYS' AND YOUTHS' CLOTHING — IN GENTS' HOSIERY — IN GENTS' FURNISHING GOODS — IN LADIES' GAITERS AND SLIPPERS — IN CHILDREN'S CLOTHING — IN WORKS' DRESSES — IN SMALL BOYS' SUITS — IN INFANTS' WARDROBES — IN INFANTS' CLOAKS — IN LADIES' HOSE OR CHEMISE — IN LADIES' UNDERLINEN — IN BRIDAL OUTFITS — IN LADIES' HOSIERY — IN CHILDREN'S DRESSES — IN CHILDREN'S FANCY HATS — IN LADIES' HEAD-DRESSES — IN LADIES' FURS — IN CHILDREN'S FURS — IN SILVER HOSIERY — IN GENTS' FURS — IN LADIES' SILK CLOAKS — IN GENTS' FUR CAPS — IN LADIES' OR MISSES' VELVET HATS — IN VELVET CAPS — IN BOYS' FANCY HATS — IN GENTS' OR LADIES' HATS — AT GENIN'S BAZAR, Nos. 597 and 513 Broadway.

Mother Goose For Grown Folks.
A NEW CHRISTMAS BOOK.

One volume, with Frontispiece by Billings, elegantly printed on tinted paper. Price, bound in Cloth, 75 cents.

"," Sold everywhere, and sent by mail, postage free, on receipt of the price, by HURD & CARLETON, 129 Grand Street, New York.

Sleepless, Crying, Teething Children.

All know how unpleasant are these accompaniments of babyhood, and most intelligent persons know, also, the sad consequences to health, and often life, from the use of anodynes, cordials, and similar baby dons and is quite thine. HUMPHREYS' SPECIFIC HOMŒOPATHIC BABY PILLS, (a pleasant sugar pill,) which you may drop into the mouth at any time, give you every thing to be desired from medicine. Sold by all DRUGGISTS, AT 25 CENTS PER VIAL, or sent by mail, postage paid, on receipt of price. Address HUMPHREYS' HOMŒOPATHIC MEDICINE CO., No. 562 Broadway, New York.

PIANO FORTES.

RAVEN, BACON & CO., Piano Forte Manufacturers, Warerooms No. 125 Grand Street, near Broadway, where a full assortment of Instruments may be found, exclusively of our own manufacture. Warranted in every respect.

(GET A COPY)
Memorial of Washington Irving.
A Splendid Steel Plate Engraving.

SUNNYSIDE. Illustrated. By T. Addison Richards. FAC-SIMILE of a three-paged Christmas Letter by Mr. Irving—a perfect autograph in lithograph.

Together with many Anecdotes, a number of ORIGINAL LETTERS, Reminiscences, SKETCHES, &c., of Mr. Irving: Reminiscences, by Lewis Gaylord Clark and James O. Noyes; the Letters by Mrs. Wells and Charles Dickens; and the Anecdotes of Dr. Francis and Hon. George Bancroft, all in this

January Knickerbocker,

In addition to Original Articles by Bayard, Tuckerman, Miss Prescott, Dr. A. K. Gardner, &c., &c.

For sale everywhere, 25 cents per copy.

To every $3 Subscriber to the Knickerbocker for 1860, including 12 cents extra to prepay, to be sent, free of postage, a copy of his new and splendid engraving of Mercy-Making in the Olden Time.

[] Six copies of each for five subscriptions ($15 00); ten copies for eight subscriptions ($20 00).

See Knickerbocker Advertisement in "Harper's Weekly" for December 31.

JOHN A. GRAY, Publisher,
16 and 18 Jacob Street, N. Y.

REMOVAL.
JAMES BOGARDUS,
Architect in Iron, Originator, Constructor, and Patentee of IRON BUILDINGS,
Patentee and Manufacturer of
BOGARDUS'S ECCENTRIC UNIVERSAL MILL.
Warehouses corner of White and Elm Streets,
In Harlem Railroad Depot.
Office No. 327 Canal Street, over Centre, New York.
Iron Building corner Centre and Duane Sts., formerly occupied, has been removed to abutting Duane Street.

MUSICAL BOXES,

Playing 2, 3, 4, 6, 8, 10, 12, 15, 24, and 36 tunes.
PALLARD & MARTIN, Importers,
Musical Boxes repaired, 21 Maiden Lane, N. Y.

Piano Fortes,

Of the newest style, finest tone, and lowest rates.
HAZLETON BRO'S, Manufacturers,
Warerooms No. 59 Prince, near Broadway.

Boudoir Sewing Machine.
Harris' Patent.

The best and only reliable double-thread Machine making the celebrated GROVER & BAKER STITCH by authority, at $40.

Every Machine warranted for one year.

L. A. BIGELOW, Agent,
43 TREMONT STREET, Boston,
and 504 Broadway, New York.

Singer's Sewing Machines.

SINGER'S No. 2 Sewing Machine, $100.
SINGER'S No. 1 Sewing Machine, $80.
HEMMING GAUGES REDUCED TO $4.

Singer's Family Sewing Machine at $80 and $75 are capable of performing, in the best style, all the sewing of a private family.

Send for a copy of I. M. Singer & Co.'s Gazette, which includes full and reliable information of every kind, sizes, etc., of Sewing Machines, and will be supplied gratis.

I. M. SINGER & CO.,
No. 458 Broadway, New York.

ROSSITER & MIGNOT'S PAINTING,
"The Home of Washington after the War."

On Exhibition at the ACADEMY OF DESIGN, 10th Street, near Broadway, from 9 A.M. to 5 P.M., and from 7 to 9 Evenings. Admission 50 cents.

SECURE.

Beautiful! Elegant! Delightful!

A new Discovery!
Soft Brown Hair
For Beautifying, Puling, Curling,
Dressing, Invigorating, Cleansing, Glossing,
Laying and Setting the Hair.
Imparts a Rich Gloss and Delightful
And at same time a stiffness
As you may desire the Hair so it remains
Keeps the Hair in posit on.
Makes the Hair beautiful.
It is the best ideal of the Toilet.
It is the best Hair Dressing ever used
By Ladies and Children of any
The so plan silva of the day.
For the Dressing, Packing, and Respectability.
Makes glossy Curls
It's a Beautiful Article
FOR FIRST-CLASS USERS.
Delightful—Delightful—Delightful!
It should be in every family.
It's the best article
For the Hair—For the Hair
In the World
In the World
In the World
Address ROBERT SCIPLE,
Depot, 58 Ann Street, N. Y., near Astor House.
Price 50 cents per box. Sold everywhere.

FRENCH MINK CAPE, Muff, and Cuffs, only $15. WILLIAMS, 251 Fulton St., Brooklyn.

JUST PUBLISHED.—On Single and Married Life; or, The Institutes of Marriage. By the Rev. WILLIAM ALCOTT. Price 50 cents, in paper cover. For sale by H. DEXTER & CO., 121 Nassau Street, N. Y., and all Booksellers.

HIGHLY IMPORTANT TO BOTH SEXES. Married or single, in health or disease.—MEDICAL ADVISER AND MARRIAGE GUIDE, 200d edition, over 400 pages, 12mo, cloth, and above 100 illustrative Engravings. Price $1. By a celebrated Paris and London Physician and Surgeon, now of New York City. The most popular work ever published in the hands of every adult person, as it imparts knowledge all have sought for in vain in any other work. Sold by E. LAVERENCE, No. 1 Tryon Street, Astor House.

Spalding's Prepared Glue!
A Stitch in Time Saves Nine.
ECONOMY!
Dispatch!
Save the Pieces!
Useful in every house for mending Furniture, Toys, Crockery, Glass-ware, &c.
Wholesale Depot, No. 59 Plain Street, New York.
Address HENRY C. SPALDING & CO.,
Box No. 3,000 New York.

Put up for Dealers in Cases containing four, eight, and twelve dozen—a beautiful Lithograph Show-Card accompanying each package.

The Gift Book of the Season.
Mr. King's Elegant Work.

The White Hills:

THEIR LEGEND, LANDSCAPE, AND POETRY.

By Rev. T. STARR KING.

Illustrated by Sixty fine Engravings on Wood by JOHN FOLEY,
From Original Designs by WHEELOCK.

One vol. Small quarto. Elegantly printed on Tinted Paper.

A work, the most creditable to American Art, of any ever issued.

Expressly designed for the Holidays, and one of the most attractive and valuable works of the season. Author and Artist have combined to make this a work of permanent interest and worth.

CROSBY, NICHOLS & CO., Publishers,
117 Washington Street, Boston.

New Holiday Books,

Just Published by
CROSBY, NICHOLS & CO.,
And for sale by the principal Booksellers in the United States.

FRANK WILDHAIR'S ADVENTURES IN LAND AND WATER. By Frederick Gerstaecker. Translated and Revised by Lascelles Wraxall. With Eight Illustrations, printed in oil colors. 16mo. Price $1.

A most interesting and attractive book for the young, equal in every respect to the popular works by Mayne Reid, and much cheaper in mechanical execution.

MANY A LITTLE MAKE A MICKLE. Tales Translated from the German. By Trauermantel. With Six Illustrations printed in oil colors. 16mo. Price 75 cents.

HOLLY AND BIRTHTIDE. Tales Translated from the German of Rosalie Koch. By Trauermantel. With Six Illustrations printed in oil colors. 16mo. Price 75 cents.

These two juveniles are a continuation of the Series of German stories so deservedly popular. They contain stories of the most delightful stories published for the young, and are fully illustrated with colored engravings.

THE LIFE OF LAFAYETTE. Written for Children. By E. Cecil, author of "The Life of Washington." Illustrated with Six Colored Engravings. 16mo. Price 75 cents.

The second of the series of Lives of the Generals of the Revolution, by a new and popular author. This series is prepared expressly for the instruction and entertainment of American children and youth.

THE LIFE OF WASHINGTON. Written for Children. By E. Cecil. Illustrated with Six Colored Engravings. 16mo. Price 75 cents.

An invaluable little book. Every boy and girl in the United States should own a copy of the Memoir of the "Father of his country" by E. CECIL.

A MOTHER'S HYMNS FOR YOUNG CHILDREN. A beautiful little volume, entirely original, filled with such hymns as every mother would wish her child to learn.

CROSBY, NICHOLS & CO.,
PUBLISHERS,
117 Washington Street, Boston.

CLOVE ANODYNE

TOOTHACHE DROPS.

Complain no more of Aching Teeth.

This will cure you in One Minute!!!

Price 25 cents per Vial.

Will be sent free, per Mail, to any part of the United States, on receipt of 25 cents to prepay stamps.

Prepared by A. B. & D. SANDS, Druggists, 100 Fulton Street, corner of William, New York.

WHAT IS BEAUTY?

A beautiful complexion, unmarred by freckles or pimples, and to obtain this complexion, use PRALEY'S SNOW WHITE CRYSTAL CREAM. Every Lady can make herself beautiful by using it. One trial will satisfy any lady that it is the most wonderful preparation ever made, and it is warranted perfectly harmless.

CANVASSERS WANTED TO SELL LARGE FINE STEEL ENGRAVINGS. Apply to HOLBROOK, 16 Park Row, New York.

Mercantile Record.

Patent Champion Safes.

S. C. Herring & Co., 251 Broadway.

H. B. Dodwell,—Music Store, 6 Astor Place.—Publisher and Dealer in Music and Instruments.

Direction Labels and Tags.

Manger, Victor & Co., 115 Chambers Street.

CHRISTMAS AND NEW YEAR'S HOLIDAY PRESENTS,
At E. A. CROSBY'S, 323 Broadway, cor. 4th Street.
GIFT-BOOKS, Illustrated and Plain.
STANDARD WORKS in Fine Bindings.
ILLUMINATED INVITATIONS and BOOKS.
Splendid assortment of BIBLES, and the BOOK OF COMMON PRAYER, bound in Velvet, Turkey, and Calf, ornamented.
AMUSING GAMES.
CHOICE VARIETY OF FANCY ARTICLES.
T. J. CROWEN, No. 609 Broadway, cor. 4th Street.

Helper's Impending Crisis.

A LIVE BOOK.

55,000 COPIES HAVE BEEN SOLD.

Now is the time.

This is the Work that is creating so much excitement IN CONGRESS.

Large 12mo Vol., 450 pages. Price $1.

Cotton Edition, Paper Covers, 50 cents.

ACTIVE AGENTS WANTED

to sell these Works in the country towns. Terms liberal. Single copies sent to any address, post-paid, on receipt of price. Address A. BURDICK, Publisher,
No. 148 Nassau Street, New York.

ON THURSDAY, DECEMBER 22D,

THE SECOND PART

—OF—

TOM BROWN AT OXFORD

WILL BE PUBLISHED BY

TICKNOR & FIELDS.

$10,000 Warranted to be made yearly by from a Cash Capital of only $5. For particulars address, with return postage,
R. WILSON, Biltmore, Buncombe Co., N. Y.

Holiday Presents.

J. & C. Berrian,

No. 601 Broadway.

Fancy Goods, Cutlery, Silver Plated Ware, Skates and Sleighs, Tool-Chests, Games, &c.

THE SANCTUS: A Collection of Church Music, Ancient and Modern, arranged, selected, and to the Worship of all protestant Christian Denominations. The best Hymns and Tunes in general use to learn and sing to sing, being carefully revised and corrected. Also, a Collection of Anthems, selected by a natural Ear of Melody, combined with Harmony and Music without weakness, and rich without redundancy. Price in boards, $1 25. In cloth, $1 50. Published by CLYDE DITSON & CO., 277 Washington Street, Boston.

Thimbles versus Scissors.

Steirly's Patent Thread-Cutting Thimbles,

Can be obtained at any fancy retail store.

By the use of this Thimble the operator can dispense with scissors, and the very injurious practice of biting off the thread, thereby saving time and labor, as well as science and annoyance may be saved. Try it, and you will be astonished.

Wholesale Depot, 18 Wall Street, N. Y.
W. HYDE WILLINGTON, Agent.

FINKLE & LYON'S SEWING MACHINES Have received the Highest Medal at the FAIR OF THE AMERICAN INSTITUTE, the Highest premium for FINE SEWING MACHINE WORK. Also, the Highest premium at the FAIR OF THE FRANKLIN INSTITUTE, THE NEW JERSEY STATE FAIR, and so generally wherever exhibited.

OFFICE 853 BROADWAY.

Jules Hauel's Rose Tooth Paste is one of the most valuable articles ever offered to the public to the tooth a pearly whiteness, and removing all extraneous matter from the teeth, and leaving the gums in a fine state of health. It imparts a delightful fragrance to the breath. Sold by all Druggists, and by JULES HAUEL & CO., No. 764 Canal street, New York.

LONGFELLOW'S EVANGELINE.

A most brilliant and charming Piano Forte piece under the above title, composed by WM. MASON, just been published by the undersigned. Price 50 cents. Copies sent by mail, post paid.

FIRTH, POND & CO., 547 Broadway, N. Y.

American Guano.

TO FARMERS AND DEALERS

In Guano. This Guano is now manufactured in Peabody, Mass., and has been proved to be the most valuable fertilizer ever discovered, selling at less than half the price, and at less than two thirds the price of Peruvian. For particulars address U. S. MANUFACTURING CO., 60 William Street, New York.

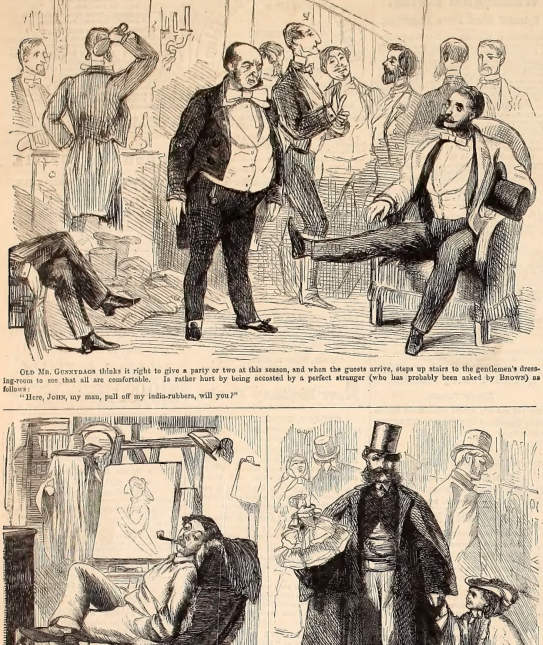
Two Works Valuable to the Sick or Well.

Each by mail, no pay expected until received, read, and approved.

Address Dr. S. S. FITCH, 714 Broadway, New York.

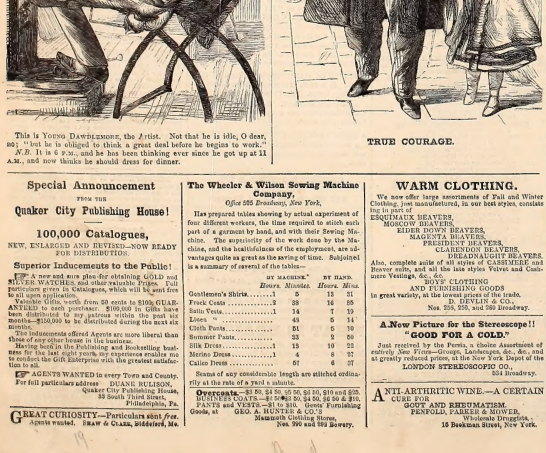
Vol. SIX LECTURES on the causes, prevention, and cure of Lung Tissue, and Skin diseases; Rheumatism, and Male and Female complaints. On the mode of Preserving Health to 100 years. 413 pages, 16 Engravings. —Price $1 cents, in silver or P. O. stamps.

Vol. A work on the Cause and Cure of Diseases of the Heart, Stomach, Liver, Bowels, and Kidneys; on Apoplexy, Palsy, and Dropsy; why we grow old and what causes diseases. 116 pages, 5 engravings. Price 25 cents. Say which book you wish, giving name, state, county, town, and post office.



OLD MR. GUNNYBAGS thinks it right to give a party or two at this season, and when the guests arrive, steps up stairs to the gentlemen's dressing-room to see that all are comfortable. Is rather hurt by being accosted by a perfect stranger (who has probably been asked by Brown) as follows:

"Here, JOHN, my man, pull off my india-rubbers, will you?"



This is YOUNG DANDLEMONT, the Artist. Not that he is idle, O dear, no! but he is obliged to think a great deal before he begins to work. N.B. It is 6 P.M., and he has been thinking ever since he got up at 11 A.M., and now thinks he should dress for dinner.

TRUE COURAGE.

HOLIDAY PRESENTS.

Fine London Watches.

For Scientific Purposes,
Or for Pocket Time-Pieces.
RICH DIAMOND JEWELRY,
Bracelets—Earrings,
Brooches—Studs, &c., &c.
— SOLID GOLD CHAINS. —

At the Factory Prices,
25 per cent. below
Retail Store Prices.

D. C. PEACOCK, LONDON,
Represented by

DAVID RAIT,
405 Broadway,
UP STAIRS.

More Popular than ever! Its Sale Unprecedented!

LYON'S KATHAIRON
FOR THE HAIR

is, beyond question, the finest and most popular article ever made. Nothing has ever given such universal satisfaction. It restores the Hair, preserves and beautifies it, and removes all Dandruff, &c. If you do not use it, try it. Sold everywhere for 25 cents per bottle.

Queru's Cod-Liver Oil Jelly,
The only certain cure for Consumption, Asthma, and all kinds of Coughs, is taken without nausea.
Also,
Queru's Patent Jellified Castor-Oil—The greasy sensation of the oil is obviated, and it does not cause any constipation after use. It is the best purgative for children. To be had at the Inventor's Office, No. 125 Fourth Avenue, and at all respectable druggists. PEN-FOLD, PARKER & MOWER, Wholesale Agents, No. 25 Beekman Street.

The Guardian Life Insurance Company,
OF NEW YORK,
Continental Bank Building, No. 7 Nassau Street.

DIRECTORS:

JAMES T. SOUTTER, DOUGLAS ROBINSON, THOMAS HUSSEY, JOS. T. ASKEW, W. H. PECHMAN, JNO. J. CRANE, JOS. B. VARNUM, WM. T. HOBBIE, GEORGE OPDYKE, JNO. H. SHERROOK, WILLIAM ALLEN,
E. V. HAUGHWOUT, ROBERT SOUTTER, JAMES W. HALSTED, WM. M. VERMILYE, FRANCIS W. TAPPAN, EBENEZER W. MASON, R. H. WARD, JAMES F. LUCE, WM. TAYLOR HALL, Bell. WILLIAM WILKENS,

JAMES W. HALSTED, President.
HENRY V. GARAGAN, Secretary.
J. SMITH HOMANS, Jr., Actuary.
G. W. FAHLER, Attorney and Counsellor.
R. P. HALSTED, M.D., } Medical Examiners.
W. E. VERMILYE, M.D., }

Issues Policies as follows, viz.:

Policies in Favor of and Payable to the Wife,
Free from the claims of Creditors.

Policies Payable on Attaining a Certain Age,
Or payable in case of death before attaining such age.

Policies Granted to Creditors,
On the Lives of their Debtors.

Policies Granted for any Number of Years,
Premiums payable in Cash, Quarterly, Semi-Annually, or Annually, in advance.

Dividends Declared every Three Years,
And the surplus belonging to the Policy Holders returned to them in scrip.

This Scrip bears 6 per cent. per annum interest, payable in cash, and on a reduction thereof is commuted when the aggregate issue shall have amounted to $1,000,000.

At the same time the Company is empowered by its charter to purchase the scrip for the benefit of the Policy Holders before that time.

This scrip is not affected by the forfeiture or sale of the policy, which is a great advantage over the system adopted by some Companies of subjecting the dividend to the same terms of forfeiture and sale as the policy, by endorsing it thereon. This is clearly unjust, as the dividend is a surplus fund, not in rightly the property of the insured, irrespective of the policy.

The interest on the scrip gradually reduces the premium.

Special Announcement
FROM THE
Quaker City Publishing House!

100,000 Catalogues,
NEW, ENLARGED AND REVISED—NOW READY FOR DISTRIBUTION.

Superior Inducements to the Public!

☞ A new and sure plan for obtaining GOLD and SILVER WATCHES, and other valuable Prizes. Full particulars given in Catalogues, which will be sent free to all upon application.

Valuable Gifts, worth from 50 cents to $100, GUARANTEED to each purchaser. $100,000 in Gifts have been distributed to my patrons within the past six months—$150,000 to be distributed during the next six months.

The inducements offered Agents are more liberal than those of any other house in the business.

Having been in the Publishing and Bookselling business for the last eight years, my experience enables me to conduct the Gift Enterprise with the greatest satisfaction to all.

☞ AGENTS WANTED in every Town and County. For full particulars address DIXANY BULSTON,
Quaker City Publishing House,
23 South Third Street,
Philadelphia, Pa.

GREAT CURIOSITY—Particulars sent free. Agents wanted. ISAAC & CHASE, Biddeford, Me.

The Wheeler & Wilson Sewing Machine Company,
Office 505 Broadway, New York,

Has prepared tables showing by actual experiment of four different workers, the time required to stitch each part of a garment by hand, and with their Sewing Machine. The superiority of the work done by the Machine, and the healthfulness of the employment, are advantages quite as great as the saving of time. Subjoined is a summary of several of the tables—

BY MACHINE.		BY HAND.
	Hours. Minutes.	Hours.	Min.
Gentlemen's Shirts.....	9	13	51
Frock Coats.....	2	38	14	55
Satin Vests.....	1	14	7	19
Linen "		43	5	14
Cloth Pants.....		51	6	10
Summer Pants.....		33	2	50
Silk Dress.....	1	13	10	23
Merino Dress.....	1	4	8	27
Calico Dress.....		57	6	37

Seams of any considerable length are stitched ordinarily at the rate of a yard a minute.

Overcoats—$3 50, $4 50, $5 50, $6 50, $10 and $25.
BUSINESS COATS—$2 50, $3 50, $4 50, $5 50 & $10.
PANTS and VESTS—$1 to $10.
Goods, at GEO. A. HUNTER & CO.'S
Mammoth Clothing Store,
Nos. 590 and 592 Bowery.

WARM CLOTHING.

We now offer large assortments of Fall and Winter Clothing, just manufactured, in our best styles, contains fur in part of
ESQUIMAUX BEAVERS,
MOSCOW BEAVERS,
ELDER DOWN BEAVERS,
MAGELLAN BEAVERS,
PRESIDENT BEAVERS,
CLARENDON BEAVERS,
DEADNAUGHT BEAVERS.
Also, complete suits of all styles of CASSIMERE and Beaver cloths, and all the late styles Velvet and Cashmere Vestings, &c., &c.
BOYS' CLOTHING
AND FURNISHING GOODS
in great variety, at the lowest prices of the trade.
D. DEVLIN & CO.,
Nos. 258, 259, and 260 Broadway.

A New Picture for the Stereoscope!!
"GOOD FOR A COLD."
Just received by the Persia, a choice Assortment of entirely New Views—Groups, Landscapes, &c., &c., and at greatly reduced prices, at the New York Depot of the LONDON STEREOSCOPIC CO.,
534 Broadway.

ANTI-ARTHRITIC WINE.—A CERTAIN CURE FOR GOUT AND RHEUMATISM.
PENFOLD, PARKER & MOWER,
Wholesale Druggists,
25 Beekman Street, New York.

71-2009.084.08084

71.2009.084.06084